

MARIUS THE EPICUREAN

---

HIS SENSATIONS AND IDEAS

---

By WALTER PATER, M.A.

FELLOW OF BRASENOSE COLLEGE, OXFORD

"Wisdom hath builded herself a house; she hath mingled her wine; she hath also prepared for herself a table."

---

A. L. BURT COMPANY, * * * * *
* * * * * PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK

1902

PR 5134

M3

1902a

GIFT ESTATE OF
VICTOR S. CLARK
SEPT. 3, 1946
THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

CONTENTS.

---

PART THE FIRST.

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. " The Religion of Numa ".....	1
II. White-Nights .....	10
III. Dilexi Decorem Domus Tuæ.....	23
IV. O Mare, O Littus, Verum Secretumque Μουσείου	36
V. The Golden Book .....	48
VI. Euphuism .....	82
VII. Pagan Death .....	100

PART THE SECOND.

VIII. Animula, Vagula, Blandula !.....	111
IX. New Cyrenaicism.....	130
X. Mirum Est Ut Animus Agitatione Motuque Corporis Excitetur.....	143
XI. The Most Religious City in the World.....	155
XII. The Divinity that Doth Hedge a King .....	170
XIII. The " Mistress and Mother " of Palaces. ....	192
XIV. Manly Amusement.....	209

PART THE THIRD

CHAPTER	PAGE
XV. Stoicism at Court.....	223
XVI. Second Thoughts.....	233
XVII. Many Prophets and Kings have Desired to See the Things which Ye See.....	251
XVIII. " The Ceremony of the Dart ".....	262
XIX. Paratum Cor Meum, Deus !... ..	277

PART THE FOURTH.

XX. Guests.....	293
XXI. The Church in Cecilia's House.....	308
XXII. The Minor " Peace of the Church ".....	323
XXIII. Sapientia Ædificavit Sibi Domum.....	341
XXIV. A Conversation Not Imaginary.....	353
XXV. Sunt Lacrimæ Rerum.....	382
XXVI. Ah ! Voilà les Ames qu'il Falloit à la Mienne !..	394
XXVII. The Triumph of Marcus Aurelius.....	404
XXVIII. Anima Naturaliter Christiana.....	414

PART THE FIRST

MARIUS THE EPICUREAN.

---

CHAPTER I.

“THE RELIGION OF NUMA.”

As, in the triumph of Christianity, the old religion lingered latest in the country, and died out at last as but paganism—the religion of the villagers—before the advance of the Christian Church; so, in an earlier century, it was in places remote from town-life that the older and purer forms of paganism itself had survived the longest. While, in Rome, new religions had arisen with bewildering complexity around the dying old one, the earlier and simpler patriarchal religion, “the religion of Numa,” as people loved to fancy, lingered on with little change amid the pastoral life, out of the habits and sentiment of which so much of it had grown. Glimpses of such a survival we may catch below the merely artificial attitudes of Latin pastoral poetry; in Tibullus especially, who has preserved for us many poetic details of old Roman religious usage.

At mihi contingat patrios celebrare Penates, Reddereque antiquo menstrua thura Lari :

—he prays, with unaffected seriousness. Something liturgical, with repetitions of a consecrated form of words, is traceable in one of his elegies, as part of the ritual of a birthday sacrifice. The hearth, from a spark of which, as one form of old legend related, the child Romulus had been miraculously born, was still indeed an altar; and the worthiest sacrifice to the gods the perfect physical sanity of the young men and women, which the scrupulous ways of that religion of the hearth had tended to maintain. A religion of usages and sentiments rather than of facts and beliefs, and attached to very definite things and places—the oak of immemorial age, the rock on the heath fashioned by weather as if by some dim human art, the shadowy grove of ilex, passing into which one exclaimed involuntarily (in consecrated phrase) Deity is in this Place!—Numen Inest!—it was in natural harmony with the temper of a quiet people amid the spectacle of rural life; like that simpler faith between man and man, which Tibullus expressly connects with the period when, with an inexpensive worship, the old wooden gods had been still pressed for room in their homely little shrines.

And about the time when the dying Antoninus Pius ordered his golden image of Fortune to be carried into the chamber of his successor (now about to test the truth of the old Platonic contention, that the world would at last find itself happy, could it but detach some reluctant philosophic student from the more desirable life of celestial contemplation, and compel him to rule it) there was a boy living in an old country-house, half farm, half villa, who, for himself, recruited that body of antique traditions by a spontaneous force of religious veneration such as had originally called them into being. It was more than a century and a half since Tibullus had written ; but the restoration of religious usages, and their retention where they still survived, had meantime become fashionable through the influence of imperial example ; and what had been in the main a matter of family pride with his father, was sustained by a native instinct of devotion in the young Marius. A sense of conscious powers external to ourselves, pleased or displeased by the right or wrong conduct of every circumstance of daily life—that conscience, of which the old Roman religion was a formal, habitual recognition, had become in him a powerful current of feeling and observance. The old-fashioned, partly puritanic awe, the power of which Wordsworth noted and valued so highly in a northern peasantry, had its counterpart in the feeling of the Roman lad, as he passed the spot, “touched of heaven,” where the lightning had struck dead an aged laborer in the field : an upright stone, still with moldering garlands about it, marked the place. He brought to that system of symbolic usages, and they in turn developed in him further, a great seriousness, an impressibility to the sacredness of time, of life and its events, and the circumstances of family fellowship—of such gifts to men as fire, water, the earth from labor on which they live, really understood by him as gifts—a sense of religious responsibility in the reception of them. It was a religion for the most part of fear, of multitudinous scruples, of a year-long burden of forms; yet rarely (on clear summer mornings, for instance) the thought of those heavenly powers afforded a welcome channel for the almost stifling sense of health and delight in him, and relieved it as gratitude to the gods.

It was the day of the “little” or private Ambarvalia, celebrated by a single family for the welfare of all belonging to it, as the great college of the Arval Brothers at Rome officiated in the interest of the whole state. At the appointed time all work ceases; the instruments of labor lie untouched, hung with wreaths of flowers; while masters and servants together go in solemn procession along the dry paths of vineyard and cornfield, conducting the victims whose blood is presently to be shed for the purification from all natural or supernatural taint of the lands they have “gone about.” The old Latin words of the liturgy, to be said as the procession moved along, though their precise meaning had long since become unintelligible, were recited from an ancient illuminated roll, kept in the painted chest in the hall, together with the family records. Early on that day the girls of the farm had been busy in the great portico, filling large baskets with flowers plucked off short from branches of apple and cherry, then in spacious bloom, to strew before the quaint images of the gods—Ceres and Bacchus and the yet more mysterious Dea Dia—as they passed through the fields, carried in their little houses, on the shoulders of white-clad youths, who were understood to proceed to that office in perfect temperance, as pure in soul and body as the air they breathed in the firm weather of that early summer-time. The clean lustral water and the full incense-box were carried after them. The altars were gay with garlands of wool and the more sumptuous sort of flowers, and the green herbs to be thrown into the sacrificial fire, fresh-gathered this morning from a particular plot in the old garden, set apart for the purpose. Just then the young leaves were almost as fragrant as flowers, and the fresh scent of the bean-fields mingled pleasantly with the cloud of incense. But for the monotonous intonation of the liturgy by the priests, clad in their strange, stiff, antique vestments, and bearing ears of green corn upon their heads secured by flowing bands of white, the procession moved in absolute stillness, all persons, even the children abstaining from speech after the utterance of the pontifical formula, Favete linguis!—Silence! Propitious Silence!—lest any words save those proper to the occasion should hinder the religious efficacy of the rite.

With the lad Marius, who, as the head of his house, took a leading part in the ceremonies of the day, there was a devout effort to complete this impressive outward silence by that inward tacitness of mind, esteemed so important by religious Romans in the performance of these sacred functions. To him the sustained stillness without seemed really but to be waiting upon that interior, mental condition of preparation or expectancy, for which he was just then intently striving. The persons about him, certainly, had never been challenged by those prayers and ceremonies to any ponderings on the divine nature: they conceived them rather to be the appointed means of setting such troublesome movements at rest. By them, "the religion of Numa," so staid, ideal and comely, the object of so much jealous conservatism, though of direct service as lending sanction to a sort of high scrupulosity, especially in the main points of domestic conduct, was mainly prized as being, through its hereditary character, something like a personal distinction—as contributing, among the other accessories of an ancient house, to the production of that aristocratic atmosphere which separated them from newly-made people. But in the young Marius, the very absence of all definite history and dogmatic interpretation from those venerable usages, had already awakened much speculative activity; and to-day, starting from the actual details of the divine service, some very lively surmises, though hardly definite enough to be thoughts, were moving backwards and forwards in his mind, as the stirring wind had done all day among the trees, and were like the passing of some mysterious influence over all the elements of his nature and experience. One thing only distracted him—a certain pity at the bottom of his heart, and almost on his lips, for the sacrificial victims and their looks of terror, rising almost to disgust at the central act of the sacrifice itself ; a piece of everyday butcher's work, such as we decorously hide out of sight ; though some then present certainly displayed an undisguised curiosity in the details of the spectacle, thus permitted them on a religious pretext. The old sculptors of the great procession on the frieze of the Parthenon of Athens, have delineated the placid heads of the victims led in it to sacrifice, with a perfect feeling for animals, in forcible contrast with any indifference as to their sufferings. It was this contrast that distracted Marius now in the blessing of his fields, and qualified his devout absorption upon the scrupulous fulfilment of all the details of the ceremonial, as the procession approached the altars.

The names of that great populace of "little gods," dear to the Roman home, which the pontiffs had placed on the sacred register of the Indigitamenta, to be invoked, because they can help, on special occasions, were not forgotten in the long litany—Vatican, who causes the infant to utter his first cry ; Fabulinus, who prompts his first word ; Cuba, who keeps him quiet in his cot ; Domiduca, especially, for whom Marius had through life a particular memory and devotion—the goddess who watches over one's safe coming home. The urns of the dead in the family chapel received their due service. They also were now become something divine, a goodly company of friendly and protecting spirits, encamped about the place of their former abode—above all others, the father, dead ten years before ; of whom, remembering but a tall, grave figure above him in early childhood, Marius habitually thought as a genius a little cold and severe.

Candidus insuetum miratur limen Olympi,
Sub pedibusque videt nubes et sidera—

Perhaps!—but certainly needs his altar here below, and flowers to-day upon his urn. But the dead genii were satisfied with little—a few violets, a cake dipped in wine, or a morsel of honeycomb. Daily, from the time when his childish footsteps were still uncertain, had Marius taken them their portion of the family meal, at the second course, amidst the silence of the company. They loved those who brought them their sustenance; but, deprived of these services, would be heard wandering through the house, crying sorrowfully in the stillness of the night.

And those simple gifts, like other objects equally trivial—bread, oil, wine, milk—had regained for him, by their use in such religious service, that poetic, and as it were moral significance, which surely belongs to all the means of our daily life, could we but break through the veil of our familiarity with things by no means vulgar in themselves. A hymn followed, while the whole assembly stood with veiled faces. The fire rose up readily from the altars, with a clean, bright flame—a favorable omen, making it a duty to render the mirth of the evening complete. Old wine was poured out freely for the servants at supper in the great kitchen, where they had worked in the imperfect light through the long evenings of winter. The young Marius himself took but a very sober part in the noisy feasting. A devout, regretful after-taste of what had been really beautiful in the ritual he had accomplished, took him early away, that he might the better recall in reverie all the circumstances of the celebration of the day. As he sank into a sleep, pleasant with all the influences of long hours in the open air, he seemed still to be moving in procession through the fields, with a sort of pleasurable awe. That feeling was still upon him as he awoke amid the beating of violent rain upon the shutters, in the first storm of the season. The thunder which startled him from sleep seemed to make the solitude of his chamber almost painfully complete, as if the nearness of the angry clouds shut him up in a close place alone in the world. Then he thought of the sort of protection which that day's ceremonies assured. To procure an agreement with the gods—Pacem deorum exposcere!—that was the meaning of what they had all day been busy upon. In a faith, sincere but half-suspicious, he would fain have those Powers at least not against him. His own nearer household gods were all around his bed: the spell of his religion as a part of the very essence of home, its intimacy, its dignity and security, was forcible at that moment; only, it seemed to involve certain heavy demands upon him.

CHAPTER II.

WHITE-NIGHTS.

To an instinctive seriousness the material abode in which the childhood of Marius was passed had largely added. Nothing, you felt, as you first caught sight of that coy, retired place—surely nothing could happen there, without its full accompaniment of thought or reverie. White-nights!—so you might interpret its old Latin name. “The red rose came first,” says a quaint German mystic, speaking of “the mystery of so-called white things,” as being “ever an after-thought—the doubles, or seconds, of real things, and themselves but half real or material—the white queen—the white witch—the white mass, which, as the black mass is a travesty of the true mass turned to evil by horrible old witches, is celebrated by young candidates for the priesthood with an unconsecrated host, by way of rehearsal.” So, white nights, I suppose, after something like the same analogy, should be nights not passed in quite blank forgetfulness, but those which we pass in continuous dreaming, only half-veiled by sleep. Certainly the place was, in such case, true to its fanciful name in this, that you might very well conceive, in the face of it, that dreaming even in the daytime might come to much there.

The young Marius represented an ancient family whose estate had come down to him much curtailed through the extravagance of a certain Marcellus two generations before, a favorite in his day of the fashionable world at Rome, where he had at least spent his substance with a correctness of taste, which Marius might seem to have inherited from him ; as he was believed also to resemble him in a singularly pleasant smile, consistent, however, in the younger face, with some degree of somber expression when the mind within was but slightly moved.

As the means of life decreased the farm had crept nearer and nearer to the dwelling-house, about which there was therefore a trace of workday negligence or homeliness, not without its picturesque charm for some, for the young master himself among them. The more observant passer-by would note, curious as to the inmates, a certain amount of dainty care amid that neglect, as if it came in part, perhaps, from a reluctance to disturb old associations. It was significant of the national character, that a sort of elegant gentleman farming, as we say, was much affected by some of the most cultivated Romans. But it was something more than an elegant diversion, something more of a serious business, with the household of Marius : and his actual interest in the cultivation of the earth and the care of flocks had brought him, at least, intimately near to those elementary conditions of life, a reverence for which, the great Roman poet as he has shown by his own half-mystic pre-occupation with them, held to be the ground of primitive Roman religion, as of primitive morals. But then, farm-life in Italy, including the culture of the vine and the olive, has a peculiar grace of its own, and might well contribute to the production of an ideal dignity of character, like that of nature itself in this gifted region. Vulgarità seemed impossible. The place, though impoverished, was still deservedly dear, full of venerable memories, and with a living sweetness of its own for to-day.

It had been then a part of the struggling family pride of the lad's father to hold by those ceremonial traditions, to which the example of the head of the state, old Antoninus Pius—an example to be still further enforced by his successor—had given a fresh though perhaps somewhat artificial popularity. It was consistent with many another homely and old-fashioned trait in him, not to undervalue the charm of exclusiveness and immemorial authority, which membership in a local priestly college, hereditary in his house, conferred upon him. To set a real value on those things was but one element in that pious concern for his home and all that belonged to it, which, as Marius afterwards discovered, had been a strong motive with his father. The ancient hymn—Jana Novella!—was still sung by his people, as the new moon grew bright in the west, and even their wild custom of leaping through heaps of blazing straw on a certain night in summer was not discouraged. Even the privilege of augury, according to one tradition, had at one time belonged to his race: and if you can imagine how, once in a way, an impressible boy might have an inkling, an inward mystic intimation, of the meaning and consequences of all that, what was implied in it becoming explicit for him, you conceive aright the mind of Marius, in whose house the auspices were still carefully consulted before every undertaking of moment.

The devotion of the father, then, had handed on loyally—and that is all many not unimportant persons ever find to do—a certain tradition of life, which came to mean much for the young Marius. It was with a feeling almost exclusively of awe that he thought of his dead father; though at times indeed, with a not unpleasant sense of liberty, as he could but confess to himself, pondering, in the actual absence of so weighty and continual a restraint, upon the arbitrary power which Roman religion and Roman law gave to the parent over his son. On the part of his mother, on the other hand, entertaining the husband's memory, there was a sustained freshness of regret, together with the recognition, as Marius fancied, of some costly self-sacrifice, to be credited to the dead. The life of the widow, languid and shadowy enough but for the poignancy of that regret, was like one long service to the departed soul; its many annual observances centering about the funeral urn—a tiny, delicately carved marble house, still white and fresh—in the family-chapel, wreathed always with the richest flowers from the garden: the dead, in those country places, being allowed a somewhat closer neighborhood to the old homes they were supposed still to protect, than is usual with us, or was usual in Rome itself—a closeness which, so diverse are the ways of human sentiment, the living welcomed, and in which the more wealthy, at least in the country, might indulge themselves. All this Marius followed with a devout interest, sincerely touched and awed by his mother's sorrow. After the deification of the emperors, we are told, it was considered impious so much as to use any coarse expression in the presence of their images. To Marius the whole of life seemed full of sacred presences, demanding of him a similar collectiveness. The severe and archaic religion of the villa, as he conceived it, begot in him a sort of devout circumspection lest he should fall short at any point of the demand upon him of anything in which deity was concerned: he must satisfy, with a kind of sacred equity, he must be very cautious not to be wanting to, the claims of others, in their joys and calamities—the happiness which deity sanctioned, or the blows in which it made itself felt. And from habit, this feeling of a responsibility towards the world of men and things, towards a claim for due sentiment concerning them on his side, came to be a part of his nature not to be put off. It kept him serious and dignified amid the Epicurean speculations, which in after years much engrossed him, when he had learned to think of all religions as indifferent—serious, amid many fopperies, and through many languid days; and made him anticipate all his life long, as a thing towards which he must carefully train himself, some great occasion of self-devotion, like that which really came, which should consecrate his life, and it might be the memory of it among others; as the early Christian looked forward to martyrdom at the end of his course, as a seal of worth upon it.

The traveler, descending from the slopes of Luna, even as he got his first view of the Port-of-Venus, would pause by the way, to read the face, as it were, of so beautiful a dwelling-place, lying well away from the white road, at the point where it began to decline somewhat steeply to the marsh-land below. The building of pale red and yellow marble, mellowed by age, which he saw beyond the gates, was indeed but the exquisite fragment of a once large and sumptuous villa. Two centuries of the play of the sea-wind were in the velvet of the mosses which lay along its inaccessible ledges and angles. Here and there the marble plates had slipped from their places, where the delicate weeds had forced their way. The graceful wildness which prevailed in garden and farm, gave place to a singular nicety about the actual habitation, and a still more scrupulous sweetness and order reigned within. The old Roman architects seem to have well understood the decorative value of the floor—the real economy there was, in the production of rich interior effect, of a somewhat lavish expenditure upon the surface they trod on. The pavement of the hall had lost something of its evenness; but, though a little rough to the foot, polished and cared for like a piece of silver, looked, as mosaic-work is apt to do, its best in old age. Most noticeable among the ancestral masks, each in its little cedar chest below the cornice, was that of the wasteful but elegant Marcellus, with the quaint resemblance in its yellow waxen features to Marius, just then so full of animation and country color. A chamber, curved ingeniously into oval form, which he had added to the mansion, still contained his collection of works of art; above all, the head of Medusa, for which the villa was famous. The spoilers of one of the old Greek towns on the coast had flung away, or lost the thing, as it seemed, in some rapid flight across the river below, from the sands of which it had been drawn up in a fisherman's net, with the fine golden laminæ still clinging here and there to the bronze. It was Marcellus also who had contrived the prospect-tower of two stories, with the white pigeon-house above it, so characteristic of the place. The little glazed windows in the uppermost chamber framed each its dainty landscape—the pallid crags of Carrara, like wildly twisted snow-drifts above the purple heath; the distant harbor with its freight of white marble going to sea; the lighthouse temple of Venus Speciosa on its dark headland, amid the long-drawn curves of white breakers. Even on summer nights the air there had always a motion in it, and drove the scent of the new-mown hay along all the passages of the house.

Something pensive, spellbound, and as but half real, something cloistral or monastic, as we should say, united to that exquisite order, made the whole place seem to Marius, as it were—sacellum—the peculiar sanctuary of his mother, who, still in real widowhood, provided the deceased Marius the elder, with that secondary sort of life which we can give to the dead, in our intensely realized memory of them—the “subjective immortality,” as some now call it, for which many a Roman epitaph cries out plaintively to widow or sister or daughter, still alive in the land of the living. Certainly, if any such considerations regarding them do reach the shadowy people, he enjoyed that secondary existence, that warm place still left, in thought at least, beside the living, the desire for which is actually, in various forms, so great a motive with most of us. And Marius the younger, even thus early, came to think of women’s tears, of women’s hands to lay one to rest, in death as in the sleep of childhood, as a sort of natural want. The soft lines of the white hands and face, set among the many folds of the veil and stole of the Roman widow, busy upon her needlework, or with music sometimes, defined themselves for him as the typical expression of maternity. Helping her with her white and purple wools, and caring for her musical instruments, he won, as if from the handling of such things, an urbane and feminine refinement, qualifying the freshness of his country-grown habits—the sense of a certain delicate blandness, which he relished, above all, on returning to the “chapel” of his mother, after long days of open-air exercise, in winter or stormy summer. For poetic souls in old Italy felt, hardly less strongly than the English, the pleasures of winter, of the hearth, with the very dead warm in its generous heat, keeping the young myrtles in flower, though the hail is beating hard without. One important principle, of fruit afterwards in his Roman life, that relish for the country fixed deeply in him ; in the winters especially, when the sufferings of the animal world come so palpably before even the least observant. It fixed in him a sympathy for all creatures, for the almost human sicknesses and troubles of the flocks, for instance. It was a feeling which had in it something of religious veneration for life, as such—for that mysterious essence which man is powerless to create in even the feeblest degree. One by one, at the desire of his mother, the lad broke down his cherished traps and springes for the hungry wild birds on the salt marsh. A white bird, she told him once, looking at him gravely—a bird which he must carry in his bosom across a crowded public place—his own soul was like that ! Would it reach the hands of his good genius on the opposite side, unruffled and unsoiled ? And as his mother became to him the very type of maternity in things—its unfailing pity and protectiveness—and maternity itself the central type of all love ; so, that beautiful dwelling-place gave singular reality and concreteness to a peculiar ideal of home, which through all the rest of his life he seemed, amid many distractions of spirit, to be ever seeking to regain.

And a certain vague fear of evil, constitutional in him, enhanced still further that sentiment of home, as a place of tried security. His religion, that old Italian religion, in contrast with the really light-hearted religion of Greece, had its deep undercurrent of gloom, its sad, haunting imageries, not exclusively confined to the walls of Etrurian tombs. The function of the conscience, not always as the prompter of a gratitude for benefits received, but oftenest as his accuser before those angry heavenly masters, had a large place in it ; and the sense of some unexplored evil, ever dogging his footsteps, made him oddly suspicious of particular places and persons. Though his liking for animals was so strong, yet one fierce day in early summer, as he walked along a narrow road, he had seen the snakes breeding ; and had ever afterwards avoided that place and its ugly associations, for there had been something in the incident which had made food distasteful and his sleep uneasy for many days afterwards. The memory of it however had almost passed away, when at the corner of a street in Pisa, he came upon an African showman exhibiting a great serpent ; and again, as the reptile writhed, the former painful impression revived : it was like a peep into the lower side of the real world, and again for many days took all sweetness from sleep and food. He wondered at himself indeed, trying to puzzle out the secret of that repugnance, having no particular dread of a snake's bite, like one of his companions, who had put his hand into the mouth of an old garden-god and roused there a sluggish viper. A kind of pity even mingled with his aversion, and he could hardly have killed or injured the animals, which seemed already to suffer by the very circumstance of their life. It was something like a fear of the supernatural, or perhaps rather a moral feeling, for the face of a great serpent, with no grace of fur or feathers, unlike the faces of birds or quadrupeds, has a kind of humanity of aspect in its spotted and clouded nakedness. There was a humanity, dusty and sordid, and as if far gone in corruption, in the sluggish coil, as it awoke suddenly into one metallic spring of pure enmity against him. Long afterwards, when it happened that at Rome he saw, a second time, a showman with his serpents, he remembered the night which had then followed, thinking, in Saint Augustine's vein, on the real greatness of those little troubles of children, of which older people make light ; but with a sudden gratitude also, as he reflected how richly possessed his life had actually been of beautiful aspects and imageries, seeing how greatly what was repugnant to the eye disturbed his peace.

Thus the boyhood of Marius passed ; on the whole, more given to contemplation than to action. Less prosperous in fortune than at an earlier day there had been reason to expect, and animating his solitude, as he read eagerly and intelligently, with the traditions of the past, already he lived much in the realm of the imagination, and became betimes, as he was to continue all through life, something of an idealist, constructing the world for himself in great measure from within, by the exercise of meditative power. A vein of subjective philosophy, with the individual for its measure of all things, there was to be always in his intellectual scheme of the world and of conduct, with a certain incapacity wholly to accept other men's values of things. And the generation of this peculiar element in his temper he could trace up to the days when his life had been so like the reading of a romance to him. Had the Romans a word for unworldly? The beautiful word umbratilis comes nearest to it, perhaps; and, in that precise sense, might describe the spirit in which he prepared himself for the sacerdotal function, hereditary in his family—the sort of mystic enjoyment he had in the abstinence, the strenuous self-control and ascêsis, which such preparation involved. Like the young Ion in the beautiful opening of the play of Euripides, who every morning sweeps the temple floor with such a fund of cheerfulness in his service, he was apt to be happy in sacred places, with a susceptibility to their peculiar influences which he never outgrew; so that often in after-times, quite unexpectedly, this feeling would revive in him, still fresh and strong. That first, early, boyish ideal of priesthood, the sense of dedication, survived through all the distractions of the world, when all thought of such vocation had finally passed from him, as a ministry, in spirit at least, towards a sort of hieratic beauty and orderliness in the conduct of life.

And now what relieved in part this over-tension of soul was the lad's pleasure in the country and the open air; above all, the ramble to the coast, over the marsh with the dwarf roses and wild lavender, and the delightful signs, one after another—the abandoned boat, the ruined flood-gates, the flock of wild birds—that one was approaching the sea ; the long summer-day of idleness among its vague scents and sounds. And it was characteristic of him that he relished especially the grave, subdued, northern notes in all that—the charm of the French or English notes, as we might term them—in the luxuriant Italian landscape.

CHAPTER III.

DILEXI DECOREM DOMUS TUÆ.

THAT almost morbid religious idealism, and his healthful love of the country, were both alike developed by the circumstances of a journey, which happened about this time, when Marius was taken to a certain temple of Æsculapius, among the hills of Etruria, as was then usual in such cases, for the cure of some boyish sickness. The religion of Æsculapius, though borrowed from Greece, had been naturalized in Rome in the old republican times; but it was under the Antonines that it reached the height of its popularity throughout the Roman world. It was an age of valetudinarians, in many instances of imaginary ones; but below its various crazes concerning health and disease, largely multiplied a few years after the time of which I am speaking by the miseries of a great pestilence, lay a valuable, because partly practicable, belief that all the maladies of the soul might be reached through the subtle gateways of the body.

Salus—salvation—for the Romans, had come to mean bodily sanity; and the religion of the god of bodily health—Salvator, as they called him, absolutely—had a chance just then of becoming the one religion; that mild and philanthropic son of Apollo surviving, or absorbing, all other pagan godhead. The apparatus of the medical art, the salutary mineral or herb, diet or abstinence, and all the varieties of the bath, came to have a kind of sacramental character ; so deep was the feeling, in more serious minds, of a moral or spiritual profit in physical health, beyond the obvious bodily advantages one had of it ; the body becoming truly, in that case, but a quiet handmaid of the soul. The priesthood or "family" of Æsculapius, a vast college, believed to be in possession of certain precious medical secrets, came nearest perhaps, of all the institutions of the pagan world, to the Christian priesthood ; the temples of the god, rich, in some instances, with the accumulated thank-offerings of centuries of a tasteful devotion, being really also a kind of hospitals for the sick, administered in a full conviction of the religiousness, the refined and sacred happiness, of a life spent in the relieving of pain.

Elements of a really experimental and progressive knowledge there were doubtless amid this devout enthusiasm, bent so faithfully on the reception of health as a direct gift from God ; but for the most part his care was held to take effect through a machinery easily capable of misuse for purposes of religious fraud. It was above all through dreams, inspired by Æsculapius himself, that information as to the cause and cure of a malady was held to come to the sufferer, in a belief based on the truth that dreams do sometimes, for those who watch them carefully, give many hints concerning the conditions of the body—those latent weak points at which disease or death may most easily break into it. In the time of Marcus Aurelius these medical dreams had become more than ever a fashionable caprice. Aristeides, “the Orator,” a man of undoubted intellectual power, has devoted six discourses to their interpretation; the really scientific Galen has recorded how beneficently they had intervened in his own case, at certain turning-points of life; and a belief in them was one of the frailties of the wise emperor himself. Partly for the sake of these dreams, living ministers of the god, more likely to come to one in his actual dwelling-place than elsewhere, it was almost a necessity that the patient should sleep one or more nights within the precincts of a temple consecrated to his service, during which time he must observe certain rules prescribed by the priests.

It was for this purpose that after devoutly saluting the Lares, as was customary before starting on a journey, Marius set forth one summer morning for the great temple which lay among the hills beyond the valley of the Arnus. It was his greatest adventure hitherto; and he had much pleasure in all its details, in spite of his feverishness. Starting early, under the guidance of an old serving-man who drove the mules, with his wife who took all that was needful for their refreshment on the way and for the offering at the shrine, they went, under the genial heat, halting now and then to pluck certain flowers seen for the first time on these high places, upwards, through a long day of sunshine, while cliffs and woods sank gradually below their path. The evening came as they passed along a steep white road with many windings among the pines, and it was night when they reached the temple, the lights of which shone out upon them as they paused before the gates of the sacred enclosure, and Marius became alive to a singular purity in the air. A rippling of water about the place was the only thing audible, as they waited till two priestly figures, speaking Greek to each other, admitted them into a large, white-walled and clearly lighted guest-chamber, in which, as he partook of a simple but wholesomely prepared supper, Marius still seemed to feel pleasantly the height they had attained to among the hills.

The agreeable sense of all this was spoiled by only one thing, his old fear of serpents; for it was under the form of a serpent that Æsculapius had come to Rome; and the last definite thought of his weary head before he fell asleep had been a dread either that the god might appear, as he was said sometimes to do, under this hideous aspect, or perhaps one of those great sallow-hued snakes themselves, kept in the sacred place, as he had also heard was usual.

And after an hour's feverish dreaming he awoke—with a cry, it would seem, for someone had entered the room with a light; but the footsteps of the youthful figure which approached and sat by his bedside were certainly real. Ever afterwards, when the thought arose in his mind of some unexpected but entire relief from distress, like blue sky in a storm at sea, would come back the memory of that gracious countenance which, amid all the kindness of its gaze, had yet a certain air of dominance over him, so that he seemed now for the first time to have found the master of his spirit. It would have been sweet to be the servant of him who now sat beside him speaking.

He caught a lesson from what was then said, still somewhat beyond his years, a lesson in the skilled cultivation of life, of experience, of opportunity, which seemed to be the aim of the young priest's recommendations. The sum of them, through various forgotten intervals of argument, as might have happened in a dream, was the precept, repeated many times under slightly varied aspects, of a diligent promotion of the capacity of the eye, inasmuch as in the eye would lie for him the determining influence of life:—he was of the number of those who, in the words of a poet who came long after, must be “made perfect by the love of visible beauty.” It was a discourse conceived from the point of view of a theory which Marius afterwards found in Plato's Phædrus, the theory of the ἀπορρόγη τοῦ καλλοῦς, which supposes men's spirits to be susceptible to certain influences, diffused, like streams or currents, by fair things or persons visibly present—green fields and children's faces, for instance—into the air around them; and which, with certain natures, are like potent material essences, conforming the seer to themselves as by some cunning physical necessity. This theory, in itself so fantastic, had however determined in a range of methodical suggestions, altogether quaint here and there from their circumstantial minuteness. And throughout the possibility of some vision of a new city coming down "like a bride out of heaven," a vision still indeed, it might seem, a long way off, but to be granted perhaps one day to the eyes thus trained, was presented as the motive of this laboriously practical course of direction.

"If thou wouldst have all about thee like the colors of some fresh picture, in a clear light," so the discourse recommenced after a pause, "be temperate in thy religious motions, in love, in wine, in all things, and of a peaceful heart with thy fellows." To keep the eye clear by a sort of exquisite personal alacrity and cleanliness, extending even to his dwelling-place; to discriminate, ever more and more exactly, select form and color in things from what was less select; to meditate much on beautiful visible objects, on objects, more especially, connected with the period of youth—on children at play in the morning, the trees in early spring, on young animals, on the fashions and amusements of young men; to keep ever by him if it were but a single choice flower, a graceful animal or sea-shell, as a token and representative of the whole kingdom of such things; to avoid jealousy, in his way through the world, everything repugnant to sight; and, should any circumstance tempt him to a general converse in the range of such objects, to disentangle himself from that circumstance at any cost of place, money, or opportunity; such were, in brief outline, the duties recognized, the rights demanded, in this new formula of life. It was delivered with an air of conviction, as if the speaker could indeed see into the recesses of the mental and physical constitution of the listener; and it came from the lips of one who had about him some secret fascination in his own expression of a perfect temperance, as if the merely negative quality of purity, the absence of any taint or flaw, exercised a positive influence. Long afterwards, when Marius read the Charmides—that other dialogue of Plato, into which he seems to have expressed the very genius of old Greek temperance—it was the image of this speaker which came back vividly before him, to play the chief part in the conversation.

It was as a weighty sanction of that temperance, in almost visible symbolism (an outward imagery identifying itself with unseen moralities) that the memory of the double experience of that night, the dream of the great sallow snake and the utterance of the young priest, always returned to him; and it was a contrast which made him revolt with unfaltering instinct from the bare thought of any excess in sleep, or diet, or even in matters of taste, still more from any excess of a coarser kind.

When he awoke again in that exceeding freshness which he had felt on his arrival the evening before, but with the clear sunlight all about him, it seemed as if his sickness had really departed with the terror of the night: a confusion had passed from the brain, a painful dryness from his hands. It was a delight merely to be alive and there; and as he bathed in the fresh water, set ready for his use, the air of the room about him seemed like pure gold, and the very shadows rich with color. Summoned at length by one of the white-robed brethren, he went out to walk in the temple garden. At a distance, on either side, his guide pointed out to him the Houses of Birth and Death, erected for the reception respectively of women about to become mothers and those about to die; neither of those incidents being allowed to defile, as was thought, the actual precincts of the shrine. His visitor of the previous night he saw nowhere again. But among the official ministers of the place there was one, already pointed out as of great celebrity, and whom Marius saw often in after years at Rome, the physician Galen, now about thirty years old. He was standing with his hood partly drawn over his face, beside the holy well, as Marius and his guide approached it.

This famous well or conduit, the original cause of the temple and its surrounding institutions, was supplied by the water of a spring which flowed directly out of the rocky foundations of the shrine. From the rim of its basin rose a circle of trim columns, supporting a cupola of singular lightness and grace, seeming to cast no shadow across the well, and itself full of light from the rippling surface, through which might be seen the wavy figure-work of the marble lining below, as the spring of water rushed in. Legend told of a visit of Æsculapius to this place, earlier and happier than his first coming to Rome: an inscription in letters of gold, which ran round the base of the cupola, recorded it—Huc profectus filius Dei maxime amavit hunc locum:—and it was then that this most intimately human of all the gods had given men this well, with all its salutary properties, to be his visible servant or minister. The element itself, when received into the mouth, in consequence of its entire freedom from adhering organic matter, was more like a draught of wonderfully pure air than water; and after tasting, Marius was told many mysterious circumstances concerning it, by one and another of the bystanders, delighting to talk of their marvelous well:—he who drank often of the liquid might well think that he had tasted of the Homeric lotus, so great became his desire to remain always on that spot; carried to other places, it was almost indefinitely conservative of its fine qualities; nay! a few drops of it would amend other water; and it flowed not only with unvarying abundance, but with a volume so oddly rhythmical, that the well stood always just full to the margin, whatever quantity might be drawn from it, seeming to answer with strange alacrity of service to human needs, like a true creature and pupil of the philanthropic god. And certainly the little crowd around seemed to find a singular refreshment in gazing upon it. The whole place appeared sensibly influenced by the amiable and healthful spirit of the thing. All the objects of the country were there at their freshest. In the great park-like enclosure for the maintenance of the sacred animals offered by the convalescent, grass and trees were allowed to grow with a kind of graceful wildness; otherwise, all was wonderfully nice: and that freshness seemed even to have something moral in its influence, as if it acted upon the body and the merely bodily powers of apprehension, through the intelligence; and to the end of his visit Marius saw no more serpents.

A lad was just then drawing the water for temple uses, and Marius followed him as he returned from the well, more and more impressed by the religiousness of all he saw, as he passed through a long corridor, the walls of which were well-nigh covered by votive inscriptions recording favors received from the son of Apollo, and with a lurking fragrance of incense in the air, explained, as he turned aside through an open doorway into the temple itself. His heart bounded as the refined and dainty magnificence of the place came upon him suddenly, in the flood of early sunshine, with the ceremonial lights burning here and there, and withal a singular expression of sacred order, a surprising cleanliness and simplicity. Certain priests, men whose countenance bore a deep impression of cultivated mind, each with his little group of assistants, were gliding round silently, to perform their morning salutation to the god, raising the closed thumb and finger of the right hand with a kiss in the air, as they came and went on their sacred business, bearing their frankincense and lustral water. Around the walls, at such a level that the worshipers might read, as in a book, the story of the god and his sons, the brotherhood of the Asclepiadae, ran a series of imageries, carved in low relief, their delicate light and shade being heightened, here and there, with gold. Fullest of inspired and sacred expression, as if in this place the chisel of the artist had indeed dealt not with marble but with the very breath of feeling and thought, was the scene in which the earliest generation of the sons of Æsculapius were transformed into healing dreams; for "being grown now too glorious to abide any longer among men, by the aid of their sire they put away their mortal bodies, and came into another country, yet not indeed into Elysium nor into the Islands of the Blest. But being made like to the immortal gods, they began to pass about through the world, changed thus far from their first form that they appear eternally young, as many persons have seen them in many places—ministers and heralds of their father, passing to and fro over the earth, like gliding stars. Which thing is, indeed, the most wonderful concerning them!" And in this scene, as throughout the series, with all its crowded personages, Marius noted on the carved faces the same peculiar union of unction, almost of hilarity, with a certain reserve and self-possession, which was conspicuous in the living ministrants around him.

In the central space, upon a pillar or pedestal, hung ex voto, with the richest personal ornaments, stood the image of Æsculapius himself, surrounded by choice flowering plants. It presented the type, still with something of the severity of the earlier art of Greece about it, not of an aged and crafty physician. but of a youth, earnest and strong of aspect, carrying an ampulla or bottle in one hand, and in the other a traveler's staff, as a pilgrim among his pilgrim worshipers; and one of the ministers explained to Marius this pilgrim guise: how one chief source of the master's knowledge of healing had been the observation of the remedies resorted to by animals when laboring under disease or pain—what leaf or berry the lizard or dormouse lay upon its wounded fellow; for which purpose he had for years led the life of a wanderer in wild places. The boy took his place as the last comer, a little way behind the group of worshipers who stood in front of the image; and there, lifting up his face, with the palms of his two hands raised and open before him, and taught by the priest, said his collect of thanksgiving and prayer (Aristeides has recorded it at the end of his Asclepiadæ to the Inspired Dreams):

“O ye children of Apollo! who in time past have stilled the waves of sorrow for many people, and lighted up a lamp of safety before those who travel by sea and land, be pleased, in your great condescension, though ye be equal in glory with your elder brethren the Dioscuri, and your lot in immortal youth be as theirs, to accept this prayer, which in sleep and vision ye have inspired. Order it aright, I pray you, according to your loving-kindness to men. Preserve me from sickness; and endue my body with such a measure of health as may suffice it for the obeying of the spirit, that I may pass my days unhindered and in quietness.”

On the last morning of his visit Marius entered the shrine again, and just before his departure the priest, who had been his special director during his stay at the place, lifting a cunningly contrived panel, which formed the back of one of the carved seats at the end of the temple, bade him look through. It was like the vision of a new world, by the opening of an unsuspected window in some familiar dwelling-place. He looked out upon a long-drawn valley, of a most cheerful aspect, hidden, by the peculiar conformation of the locality, from all points of observation but this. In a green meadow at the foot of the olive-clad rocks just below, the novices were taking their exercise. The sides of the vale lay both alike in full sunlight; and its distant opening was closed by a beautifully formed mountain, from which the last wreaths of morning mist were rising under the heat. It was the very presentment of a land of hope; its hollows brimful of a shadow of blue flowers; and lo! on the one level space of the horizon, in a long dark line, were towers and a dome: and that was Pisa.—Or Rome, was it? asked Marius, ready to believe the utmost, in his excitement.

All this served, as he saw afterwards in retrospect, at once to strengthen and to purify a certain vein of character in him. Developing the ideal, pre-existent there, of a religious beauty, associated for the future with the exquisite splendor of the temple of Æsculapius, as it dawned upon him on that morning of his first visit—it developed that ideal in connection with a vivid sense of the value of mental and bodily sanity. And this recognition of the beauty, even for the æsthetic sense, of mere bodily health, now acquired, operated afterwards as an influence morally salutary, counteracting the less desirable, or even hazardous tendencies of some phases of thought, through which he was to pass.

He came home, brown with health, to find the health of his mother failing; and about her death, which occurred not long afterwards, there was a circumstance which rested with him as the cruellest touch of all in an event, which for a time seemed to have taken the light out of the sunshine. She died away from home, but sent for him at the last, with a painful effort on her part, but to his great gratitude, pondering, as he always believed, that he might chance otherwise to look back all his life long upon a single fault with something like remorse, and find the burden a great one. For it had happened that, through some sudden, incomprehensible petulance of his, there had been an angry childish gesture, and a slighting word, at the very moment of her departure, actually for the last time, remembering which, he would ever afterwards pray to be preserved from offenses against his own affections; the thought of that marred parting having peculiar bitterness for one, who set so much store, both by principle and habit, on the sentiment of home.

CHAPTER IV.

O MARE, O LITTUS, VERUM SECRETUMQUE MOYŒEION !
QUAM MULTA INVENITIS, QUAM MULTA DICTATIS !

Pliny's Letters.

It would hardly have been possible to feel more seriously than did Marius in those grave years of his early life. But the death of his mother turned that seriousness of mere feeling into a matter of the intelligence ; it made him a questioner ; and by bringing into full evidence to him the force of his affections and the probable importance of their place in his future, developed in him generally the more human and earthly elements of character. A singularly virile consciousness of the realities of life pronounced itself in him ; still however, as, in the main, a poetic apprehension, though united already with something of personal ambition and the instinct of self-assertion. There were days when he could suspect, though it was a suspicion he was careful at first to put from him, that that early, much cherished religion of the villa might come to count with him as but one form of poetic beauty, or of the ideal, in things—as but one voice, in a world where there were many voices it would be a moral weakness not to listen to. And yet that one voice out of many, through its forcible preoccupation of his childish conscience, still seemed to make a claim upon him of a quite exclusive character, defining itself as essentially one of but two possible leaders of his spirit ; the other of those two leaders proposing to him an unlimited self-expansion in a world of various sunshine. It was a contrast so pronounced as to make the easy, light-hearted, unsuspecting exercise of himself, among the temptations of the new phase of life which had now begun for him, seem nothing less than a rival religion, a rival religious service. The temptations, the various sunshine, were those of the old town of Pisa, where Marius was now a tall schoolboy. It was a place lying just far enough from his home to make his rare visits to it in childhood seem like adventures, which had never failed to fill his imagination with new and refreshing impulses. The pensive, partly decayed place, which still had its commerce by sea, and its fashion at the bathing-season, had lent, at one time the vivid memory of its fair streets of marble, at another the solemn outline of the dark hills of Luna in its background, at another the living glances of its men and women, to the thickly gathering crowd of impressions, out of which his notion of the world was then forming. And while he learned that the object, or the experience, as it will be in memory, is really the chief thing to care for from first to last, in the conduct of our lives ; all these things were feeding also the idealism constitutional with him—his innate and habitual longing for a world altogether fairer than that he saw. The child could find his way in thought along those streets of the old town, expecting duly the shrines at their corners, and their recurrent intervals of garden-courts, or side-view of distant sea. The great temple of the place, as he could remember it, on turning back once for a last look, from a winding of his homeward road, counting its tall gray columns between the blue of the bay and the blue fields of blossoming flax beyond ; the harbor and its lights ; the foreign ships lying there ; the sailors' chapel of Venus and her gilded image, hung with votive gifts ; the seamen themselves, their women and children, who had a whole peculiar color-world of their own :—the boy's superficial delight in the broad light and shadow of all this was mingled with the sense of power, of unknown distance, of the danger of storm and possible death.

It was to this place that Marius came down now from White-nights, to live in the house of his tutor or guardian, that he might attend the school of a famous rhetorician, and learn, among other things, Greek. This school, one of many imitations of Plato's Academy in the old Athenian garden, lay in a quiet suburb of Pisa, and had its grove of cypresses, its porticoes, a house for the master, its chapel and images. For the memory of Marius in after-days, a clear morning sunlight seemed to lie perpetually on that severe picture in old gray and green. The lad went to this school daily betimes ; in state at first, with a young slave to carry his books ; and certainly with no reluctance, for the sight of his fellow-scholars, and their petulant activity, coming upon the sadder, sentimental moods of his childhood, awoke at once that instinct of emulation which is but the other side of social sympathy ; and he was not aware, of course, how completely the difference of his previous training had made him, even in his most enthusiastic participation in the ways of that little world, still essentially but a spectator. While all their heart was in their limited boyish race, and its transitory prizes, he was already entertaining himself, in a very pleasurable meditateness, with the little drama in action before him, as but the mimic, preliminary exercise for a larger contest ; and already with an implicit Epicureanism. Watching all the gallant effects of their little rivalries—a scene in the main of fresh delightful sunshine—he entered at once into the sensations of a rivalry beyond them, into the passion of men ; and had already recognized a certain appetite for fame, for distinction among his fellows, as his dominant motive to be.

The fame he conceived for himself at this time was, as the reader will have anticipated, of the intellectual order, that of a poet, perhaps. And as in that gray monastic tranquillity of the villa, inward voices from the reality of unseen things had come to him abundantly ; so here, among the sounds and aspects of the shore, and amid the urbanities, the graceful follies, of a bathing-place, it was the reality, the tyrannous reality, of things visible that was borne in upon him. The real world about him—a present humanity not less comely, it might seem, than that of the old heroic days—endowing everything it touched upon, however remotely, down even to its little passing tricks of fashion, with a kind of fleeting beauty, exercised over him just then a great fascination.

That apprehension had come upon him very strongly one exceptionally fine summer, the summer when at a somewhat earlier age than was usual, he had formally assumed the dress of manhood; going into the Forum for that purpose, accompanied by his friends in festal array. At night, after the full measure of those cloudless days, he would feel almost jaded, as if with a long succession of music and pictures. As he wandered through the gay streets or on the sea-shore, that real world seemed indeed boundless, and himself almost absolutely free in it, with a boundless appetite for experience, for material and spiritual adventure. Hitherto, all his rearing had tended to the imaginative exaltation of the past; but now the spectacle actually afforded to his untired and freely opened senses, suggested the reflection that the present had, it might be, really advanced beyond the past: and he was ready to boast in its very modernness. If, in a voluntary archaism the polite world of his day went back to a choicer generation, as it fancied, for the purpose of a fastidious self-correction, in matters of art, of literature, and even, as we have seen, of religion; at least it improved, by a shade or two of more scrupulous finish, on the old pattern; and the new era, like the Neu-zeit of the German enthusiasts at the beginning of our own century, might perhaps be discerned, awaiting one just but a single step onward—the perfected new manner, in the consummation of time, alike as regards the things of the imagination and the actual conduct of life. Only while the pursuit of an ideal like this demanded entire liberty of heart and brain, that old, staid, conservative religion of his childhood certainly had its being in a world of somewhat narrow restrictions. But then, the one was absolutely real, with nothing less than the reality of seeing and hearing;—the other, how vague, shadowy, problematical! Could its so limited probabilities be worth taking into account in any practical question as to the receiving or rejecting of what was indeed so real, and, on the face of it, so desirable?

And, dating from the time of his first coming to school, a great friendship had grown up for him, in that life of so few attachments—the pure and disinterested friendship of schoolmates. He had seen Flavian for the first time on the evening of the day in March on which he had arrived in Pisa, at the moment when his mind was full of wistful thoughts regarding the new life which was to begin for him next day, and he gazed curiously at the crowd of bustling scholars as they came from their classes. There was something in Flavian a shade disdainful, as he stood isolated from the rest for a moment, explained in part by his stature and the distinction of his broad, smooth forehead; though there was a pleasantness, also, for the new-comer, in the somber blue eyes which seemed somehow to be taking a keener hold upon things around than is usual with boys. Marius knew that those proud eyes made kindly note of him for a moment, and felt something like friendship at first sight. There was a tone of reserved gravity there, amid perfectly disciplined health, which, to his fancy, carried on the expression of the austere light, and the clear song of the black-bird, on that gray March evening. Flavian indeed was a creature who changed much with the changes of the passing light and shade about him, and was brilliant enough in the early sunshine in school next morning. Of all that little world of more or less gifted youth, surely the center was this lad of servile birth. Prince of the school, he had gained an easy dominion over the old Greek master by the fascination of his parts, and over his fellow-scholars by the figure he bore. He wore already the manly dress; and standing there in class, as he displayed his wonderful quickness in reckoning, or his taste in declaiming Homer, he was like a carved figure in motion, thought Marius, but with that indescribable gleam upon it which the words of Homer actually suggested as perceptible on the visible forms of the gods—

οἷα θεοὺς ἐπενήνοθεν αἰὲν ἔόντας.

A story hung by him, a story which his comrades acutely connected with his habitual air of somewhat peevish pride. Two points were held to be clear amid its general vagueness—a rich stranger paid his schooling, and he was himself very poor; though there was an attractive piquancy in the poverty of Flavian which in a scholar of another figure might have been despised. Over Marius too, his dominion was entire. Three years older than he, Flavian was appointed to help the younger boy in his studies, and Marius thus became virtually his servant in many things, taking his humors with a sort of grateful pride in being noticed at all ; and, thinking over all that afterwards, he found that the fascination he experienced had been a sentimental one, depending on the concession to himself of an intimacy, a certain tolerance of his company, granted to no other.

That was in the earliest days ; and then, as the intimacy grew, the genius, the intellectual power of Flavian, began its sway over him. The brilliant youth who loved dress, and dainty food, and flowers, and seemed to have a natural alliance with, and claim upon, everything else which was physically select and bright, cultivated also that foppery of words, of choice diction, which was common among the élite spirits of that day ; and Marius, early an expert and elegant penman, transcribed for him his verses (the euphuism of which, amid a genuinely original power, was then so irresistibly delightful to him) in beautiful ink ; receiving from him in return the profit of his really great intellectual capacities, developed and accomplished under the ambitious desire to make his way effectively in life. Among other things he introduced him to the writings of a sprightly wit, then very busy with his pen, one Lucian—writings which seemed to overflow with that intellectual light turned upon dim places, which, at least in seasons of mental fair weather, can make people laugh where they have been wont, perhaps, to pray. And, surely, the sunlight which filled those well-remembered early mornings in school, had had more than the usual measure of gold in it! Marius, at least, would lie awake before the time, thinking of the delight of the long coming hours of hard work in the presence of Flavian, as other boys dream of a holiday.

It was almost by accident at last, so wayward and capricious was he, that his reserve gave way, and Flavian told the story of his father—a freedman, presented late in life, and almost against his will, with the liberty so fondly desired in youth, and with the sacrifice of a part of his peculium—the slave's diminutive hoard—amassed by many a self-denial, in a life necessarily hard. The rich man, interested in the promise of the fair child born on his estate, sent him to school. It was the meanness and dejection, nevertheless, of that unoccupied old age which defined the leading memory of Flavian, revived sometimes, after that first confidence, with a burst of angry tears amid the sunshine. But nature had had her economy in nursing the strength of this one natural affection; for, save his half-selfish care for Marius, it was the single, really generous part—the one piety—in the lad's character. In him Marius saw the spirit of unbelief, achieved, as it were, at one step. The much-admired freedman's son, as with the privilege of a natural aristocracy, believed only in himself, and the brilliant and, in the main, sensuous gifts he had, or meant to acquire.

And then, he had certainly yielded himself, though still with untouched health in a world where manhood comes early, to the seductions of a luxurious town, and Marius wondered sometimes, in the freer revelation of himself in conversation, at the extent of his early corruption. How often, afterwards, did evil things present themselves associated malignly with the memory of that beautiful head, and with a kind of borrowed charm and sanction in the natural grace of that! To Marius at a later time, he counted for, as it were, an epitome of the whole pagan world itself. in the depth of his corruption under that perfection of form. And still, in his mobility, his animation, in his eager capacity for various life, he was so real an object, after that visionary idealism of the villa. His voice, his glance, were like the breaking in of the solid world upon one, amid the flimsy fictions of a dream. A shadow, handling all things as shadows, had felt a sudden real and poignant heat in them.

Meantime, under his guidance, Marius was learning quickly and abundantly, because with a good-will. There was that in the actual effectiveness of his figure which stimulated the younger lad to make the most of opportunity; and he had experience already that education added largely to one's capacity for enjoyment. He was acquiring what it is ever the chief function of all higher education to teach—a system or art, namely, of so relieving the ideal or poetic traits, the elements of distinction, in our every-day life—of so exclusively living in them—that the unadorned remainder of it, the mere drift and débris of life, becomes as though it were not. And the consciousness of this aim came with the reading of one particular book, then fresh in the world, with which he fell in about this time—a book which awakened the poetic or romantic capacity, as perhaps some other book might have done, but also gave it actually, as another might not have done, a strongly sensuous direction. It made him, in that visionary reception of every-day life, the seer, more especially, of a revelation in color and form. If our modern education in its better efforts really conveys to any of us that kind of idealizing power, it does so (though dealing mainly as its every-day instruments with the most select and ideal remains of ancient literature) oftenest by truant reading; and so it happened also, long ago, with Marius and his friend Flavian.

CHAPTER V.

THE GOLDEN BOOK.

THE two lads were lounging together over a book, half-buried in a heap of dry corn, in an old granary—the quiet corner to which they had climbed out of the way of their noisier companions on one of their blindest holiday afternoons. They looked round; the western sun smote through the broad chinks of the shutters. How like a picture it all was! and it was precisely the place described in what they were reading, with just that added poetic touch in the book which made it delightful and select, and, in the actual place, the ray of sunlight, transforming the rough grain among the cool brown shadows into heaps of gold. What they were intent on was, indeed, the book of books, the “golden” book of that day, a gift to Flavian, as was shown by the purple writing on the handsome yellow wrapper, following the title—Flaviane!—it said,

FLAVIANE !	FLAVIANE !	FLAVIANE !
LEGE	VIVAS !	VIVAS !
FELICITER !	FLOREAS !	GAUDEAS !

It was perfumed with oil of sandal-wood, and decorated with carved and gilt ivory bosses at each end of the roller.

And the inside was something not less dainty and fine, full of the archaisms and curious felicities in which that age delighted, quaint terms and images picked fresh from the early dramatists, the life-like phrases of some lost poet preserved by an old grammarian, racy morsels of the vernacular and studied prettinesses ;—all alike, mere playthings for the genuine power, and the natural eloquence of the erudite artist, unsuppressed by his erudition ; which however made some people angry, chiefly less well “got up” people, and especially those who were untidy from indolence.

No! it was certainly not that old-fashioned, unconscious ease of the early literature, which could never come again ; which, however, after all, had had more in common with the “infinite patience” of Apuleius, than with the hack-work readiness of his detractors, who might so well have been “self-conscious” of going slipshod. And at least he had succeeded in the precise literary effect he had intended, including a certain tincture of neology in expression—nonnihil interdum elocutione novella parum signatum—in the language of Cornelius Fronto, the contemporary prince of rhetoricians. What words he had found for conveying, with a single touch, the sense of textures, colors, incidents ! “Like jewelers’ work ! Like a myrrhine vase !”—admirers said of his writing. “The golden fiber in her hair, and the gold thread-work in her gown marked her as the mistress”—aurum in comis et in tunicis, ibi inflexum hic intextum, matronam profecto confitebatur

—he writes, with his “curious felicity,” of one of his heroines. Aurum intextum : gold fiber—well ! there was something of that kind in his own work. And then, in an age when people, from the emperor Aurelius downwards, prided themselves, unwisely, on writing in Greek, he had written for Latin people in their own tongue ; though still, in truth, with all the care of one writing a learned language. Not less inventive and happy were the incidents presented—story within story—stories with the sudden, unlooked-for changes of dreams. He had his humorous touches also : and what went to the more ordinary boyish taste, in those somewhat peculiar readers, what would have charmed boys far more purely boyish, was the adventure—the bear loose in the house at night, the wolves storming the farms in winter, the exploits of the robbers, their charming caves, the delightful thrill one had at the question—“Don’t you know that these roads are infested by robbers ?”

The scene of the romance was laid in Thessaly, the original land of witchcraft ; and took one up and down its mountains, and into its old weird towns, the haunts of magic and incantation, where all the most genuine appliances of the black art, left behind her by Medea when she fled through the country, were still in use. In the city of Hypata indeed, nothing seemed to be its true self—“You might think that through the murmuring of some cadaverous spell, all things had been changed into forms not their own : that there was humanity in the hardness of the stones you stumbled on, that the birds you heard singing were feathered men, that the trees around the walls drew their leaves from a like source. The statues seemed about to move, the walls to speak, the dumb cattle to break out in prophecy ; nay ! the very sky and the sunbeams, as if they might suddenly cry out." There are witches there who can draw down the moon, or at least the lunar virus—that white fluid she sheds ; to be found, so rarely, " on lofty, heathy places ; which is a poison, and a touch of which will drive men mad."

And in one very remote village lives the sorceress Pamphile, who turns her neighbors into various animals. What true humor in the scene where, after mounting the rickety stairs, Lucius, peeping curiously through a chink in the door, is a spectator of the transformation of the old witch herself into a bird, that she may take flight to the object of her affections—into an owl ! " First she stripped off every rag she had. Then opening a certain chest she took from it many small boxes, and removing the lid of one of them, rubbed herself over for a long time, from head to foot, with an ointment it contained, and after much low muttering to her lamp, began at last to jerk and shake her limbs. And as her limbs moved to and fro, out burst the soft feathers ; stout wings came forth to view ; her nose grew hard and hooked ; her nails were crooked into claws ; and Pamphile was an owl. She uttered a queasy screech ; and, leaping little by little from the ground to make trial of herself, fled presently, on full wing, out of doors."

By clumsy imitation of that, Lucius, the hero of the romance, transforms himself, not as he had intended into a showy winged creature, but into the animal which has given name to the book; for, throughout it, there runs a vein of racy, homely satire on the love of magic then prevalent, curiosity about which had led Lucius to meddle with the old woman's appliances. "Be you my Venus," he says to the pretty maid-servant who has introduced him to the view of Pamphile, "and let me stand by you a winged Cupid;" and, freely applying the magic ointments, sees himself transformed, "not into a bird, but into an ass!"

Well! the proper remedy for that is a meal of roses, could such be found; and many are his quaintly picturesque attempts to come by them at that adverse season; as he does at last, when the grotesque procession of Isis passes by, with a bear and other strange animals in its train, and the ass following along with the rest suddenly crunches the chaplet of roses carried in the high priest's hand.

Meantime, however, he must wait for the spring, with more than the outside of an ass; "though I was not so much a fool, nor so truly an ass," he tells us, when he happens to be left alone with a daintily spread table, "as to neglect this most delicious fare, and feed upon coarse hay." For, in truth, all through the book, there is an unmistakably real feeling for asses, with bold, Swift-like touches, and a genuine animal breadth. Lucius was the original ass, who peeping slyly from the window of his hiding-place forgot all about the big shadow he cast just above him, and gave occasion to the joke or proverb about "the peeping ass and his shadow."

But the merely marvelous, a delight in which is one of the really serious parts in most boys, passed at times, those young readers still feeling the fascination of it, into what French writers call the macabre—that species of almost insane preoccupation with the materialities of the moldering flesh, that luxury of disgust in gazing on corruption, which was connected, in this writer at least, with not a little obvious coarseness. It was a strange notion of the coarse lust of the actual world, which Marius got from some of these episodes. "I am told," they read, "that when foreigners are interred, the old witches are in the habit of out-racing the funeral procession, to ravage the corpse"—in order to obtain certain cuttings and remnants from it, with which to injure the living; "especially if the witch has happened to cast her eye upon some goodly young man." And the scene of the night-watching of a dead body lest the witches should come to tear off the flesh with their teeth, is worthy of Théophile Gautier.

But set as one of the episodes in the main narrative—a true gem amid its mockeries, its coarse though genuine humanity, its burlesque horrors, came the tale of Cupid and Psyche, full of brilliant lifelike situations—speciosa locis—and abounding in lovely visible imagery (one seemed to see and handle the golden hair, the fresh flowers, the precious works of art, in it) yet full also of a gentle idealism, so that you might take it, if you chose, for an allegory. With a concentration of all his finer literary gifts, Apuleius had gathered into it the floating star-matter of many a delightful old story.—

The story of Cupid and Psyche.

In a certain city lived a king and queen who had three daughters exceeding fair. But the beauty of the two elder, though pleasant to behold, yet passed not the measure of human praise, while such was the loveliness of the youngest that men's speech was too poor to commend it worthily and could express it not at all. Many of the citizens and of strangers, whom the fame of this excellent vision had gathered thither, confounded by that matchless beauty, could but kiss the finger-tips of their right hands at sight of her, as in adoration to the goddess Venus herself. And soon a rumor passed through the country that she whom the blue deep had borne, forbearing her divine dignity, was even then moving among men, or that, by some fresh germination from the stars, not the sea now, but the earth, had put forth a new Venus, endued with the flower of virginity.

This belief, with the fame of the maiden's loveliness, went daily further into distant lands, so that many people were drawn together to behold that glorious model of the age. Men sailed no longer to Paphos, to Cnidus or Cythera, to the presence of the goddess Venus; her sacred rites were neglected, her images stood uncrowned, the cold ashes were left to disfigure her forsaken altars. It was to a maiden that men's prayers were offered, to a human countenance they looked, in propitiating so great a godhead: when the girl went forth in the morning they strewed flowers on her way, and the victims proper to that unseen goddess were presented as she passed along. This conveyance of divine worship to a mortal kindled meantime the anger of the true Venus. "Lo! now the ancient parent of nature," she cried, "the fountain of all elements! Behold me, Venus, benign mother of the world, sharing my honors with a mortal maiden, while my name, built up in heaven, is profaned by the mean things of earth! Shall a perishable woman bear my image about with her? In vain did the shepherd of Ida prefer me! Yet shall she have little joy, whosoever she be, of her usurped and unlawful loveliness!" Thereupon she called to her that winged, bold boy, of evil ways, who wanders armed by night through men's houses, spoiling their marriages; and stirring yet more by her speech his inborn wantonness, she led him to the city and showed him Psyche as she walked.

"I pray thee," she said, "give thy mother a full revenge. Let this maid become the slave of an unworthy love." Then, embracing him closely, she departed to the shore and took her throne upon the crest of the wave. And lo! at her unuttered will, her ocean-servants are in waiting: the daughters of Nereus are there singing their song, and Portunus, and Salacia, and the tiny charioteer of the dolphin, with a host of Tritons leaping through the billows.

And one blows softly through his sounding sea-shell, another spreads a silken web against the sun, a third presents the mirror to the eyes of his mistress, while the others swim side by side below, drawing her chariot. Such was the escort of Venus as she went upon the sea.

Psyche meantime, aware of her loveliness, had no fruit thereof. All people regarded and admired, but none sought her in marriage. It was but as upon the finished work of the craftsman that they gazed upon that divine likeness. Her sisters, less fair than she, were happily wedded. She, even as a widow, sitting at home, wept over her desolation, hating in her heart the beauty in which all men were pleased.

And the king, supposing that the gods were angry, inquired of the oracle of Apollo, and Apollo answered him thus : " Let the damsel be placed on the top of a certain mountain, adorned as for the bed of marriage and of death. Look not for a son-in-law of mortal birth ; but for that evil serpent-thing, by reason of whom even the gods tremble and the shadows of Styx are afraid."

So the king returned home and made known the oracle to his wife. For many days she lamented, but at last the fulfilment of the divine precept was urgent upon her, and the company was made ready to conduct the maiden to her deadly bridal. And now the nuptial torch gathers dark smoke and ashes ; the pleasant sound of the pipe changes into a cry ; the marriage hymn concludes in a sorrowful wailing. Below her yellow wedding-veil the bride shook away her tears : insomuch that the whole city was afflicted together at the ill-luck of the stricken house.

But the mandate of the god impelled the hapless Psyche to her fate, and, those solemnities being ended, the funeral of the living soul goes forth, all the people following. Psyche, bitterly weeping, assists not at her marriage but at her own obsequies, and while the parents hesitate to accomplish a thing so unholy the daughter cries to them : “ Wherefore torment your luckless age by long weeping ? This was the prize of my extraordinary beauty ! When all people celebrated us with divine honors, and with one voice named the New Venus, it was then ye should have wept for me as one dead. Now at last I understand that that one name of Venus has been my ruin. Lead me and set me upon the appointed place. I am in haste to submit to that well-omened marriage, to behold that goodly spouse. Why delay the coming of him who was born for the destruction of the whole world ? ”

She was silent, and with firm step went on the way. And they proceeded to the appointed place on a steep mountain, and left there the maiden alone, and took their way homewards dejectedly. The wretched parents, in their close-shut house, yielded themselves to perpetual night ; while to Psyche, fearful and trembling and weeping sore upon the mountain-top, comes the gentle Zephyrus. He lifts her gently, and, with vesture floating on either side, bears her by his own soft breathing over the windings of the hills, and sets her lightly among the flowers in the bosom of a valley below.

Psyche, in those delicate grassy places, lying sweetly on her dewy bed, rested from the agitation of her soul and arose in peace. And lo! a grove of mighty trees, with a fount of water, clear as glass, in the midst; and hard by the water, a dwelling-place, built not by human hands but by some divine cunning. One recognized, even at the entering, the delightful hospitality of a god. Golden pillars sustained the roof, arched most curiously in cedar-wood and ivory. The walls were hidden under wrought silver:—all tame and woodland creatures leaping forward to the visitor's gaze. Wonderful indeed was the craftsman, divine or half-divine, who by the subtlety of his art had breathed so wild a soul into the silver! The very pavement was distinct with pictures in goodly stones. In the glow of its precious metal the house is its own daylight, having no need of the sun. Well might it seem a place fashioned for the conversation of gods with men!

Psyche, drawn forward by the delight of it, came near, and, her courage growing, stood within the doorway. One by one, she admired the beautiful things she saw; and, most wonderful of all! no lock, no chain, nor living guardian protected that great treasure-house. But as she gazed there came a voice—a voice, as it were, unclothed of its bodily vesture—"Mistress?" it said, "all these things are thine. Lie down, and relieve thy weariness, and rise again for the bath when thou wilt. We thy servants, whose voice thou hearest, will be beforehand with our service, and a royal feast shall be ready."

And Psyche understood that some divine care was providing, and, refreshed with sleep and the bath, sat down to the feast. Still she saw no one; only she heard words falling here and there, and had voices alone to serve her. And the feast being ended, one entered the chamber and sang to her unseen, while another struck the chords of a harp, invisible with him who played on it. Afterwards, the sound of a company singing together came to her, but still so that none was present to sight: yet it appeared that a great multitude of singers was there.

And the hour of evening inviting her, she climbed into the bed; and as the night was far advanced, behold the sound of a certain clemency approaches her. Then, fearing for her maidenhood, in so great solitude, she trembled, and more than any evil she knew dreaded that she knew not. And now the husband, that unknown husband, drew near, and ascended the couch, and made her his wife; and lo! before the rise of dawn he had departed hastily. And the attendant voices ministered to the needs of the newly married. And so it happened with her for a long season. And as nature has willed, that new thing, by continual use, became a delight to her, and the sound of the voice grew to be her solace in that condition of loneliness and uncertainty.

One night the bridegroom spoke thus to his beloved: "O! Psyche, most pleasant bride! Fortune has grown stern with us, and threatens thee with mortal peril. Thy sisters, troubled at the report of thy death and seeking some trace of thee, will come to the mountain-top. But if by chance their cries reach thee, answer not, neither look forth at all, lest thou bring sorrow upon me and destruction upon thyself." Then Psyche promised that she would do according to his will. But the bridegroom had fled away again with the night, And all that day she spent in tears, repeating that she was now dead indeed, shut up in that golden prison ; powerless to console her sisters, sorrowing after her, or to see their faces : and so went to rest weeping.

And after a while came the bridegroom again, and lay down beside her, and embracing her as she wept, complained, " Was this thy promise, my Psyche ? What have I to hope from thee ? Even in the arms of thy husband thou ceasest not from pain. Do now as thou wilt. Indulge thine own desire, though it seeks what will ruin thee. Yet wilt thou remember my warning, repentant too late." Then, protesting that she is like to die, she obtains from him that he suffer her to see her sisters, and to present to them moreover what gifts she would of golden ornaments ; but therewith he oftentimes advised her never at any time, yielding to pernicious counsel, to inquire concerning his bodily form, lest she fall, through unholy curiosity, from so great a height of fortune, nor feel ever his embrace again. " I would die a hundred times," she said, cheerful at last, " rather than be deprived of thy most sweet usage.

"I love thee as my own soul, beyond comparison even with Love himself. Only bid thy servant Zephyrus bring hither my sisters, as he brought me. My honeycomb! My husband! Thy Psyche's breath of life!" So he promised; and after the embraces of the night, ere the light appeared, vanished from the hands of his bride.

And the sisters, coming to the place where Psyche had been abandoned, wept loudly among the rocks, and called upon her by name, so that the sound came down to her, and running out of the palace distraught, she cried, "Wherefore afflict your souls with lamentation? I whom you mourn am here." Then summoning Zephyrus, she reminded him of her husband's bidding; and he bare them down with a gentle blast. "Enter now," she said, "into my house, and relieve your sorrow in the company of Psyche your sister."

And Psyche displayed to them all the treasures of the golden house, and its great family of ministering voices, nursing in them the malice which was already at their hearts. And at last one of them asks curiously who the lord of that celestial array may be, and what manner of man her husband? And Psyche answered dissemblingly, "A young man, handsome and mannerly, with a goodly beard. For the most part he hunts upon the mountains." And lest the secret should slip from her in the way of further speech, loading her sisters with gold and gems, she summoned Zephyrus to bear them away.

And they returned home, on fire with envy. "See now the injustice of fortune!" cried one. "We, the elder children, have been given like servants to be the wives of strangers, while the youngest is possessed of so great riches, who scarcely knows how to use them. You saw, sister! what a hoard of wealth is lying in the house; what glittering gowns; what splendor of precious gems, besides all that gold trodden under foot. If she indeed hath, as she said, a bridegroom so goodly, then no one in all the world is happier. And it may be that that husband, being of divine nature, will make her too a goddess. Nay! so in truth it is. It was even thus she bore herself. Already she looks aloft and breathes divinity; who, but a woman, has pure voices for her handmaidens, and can command the winds." "Think," answered the other, "how arrogantly she dealt with us, grudging us these trifling gifts out of all that store, and when she found our company a burden, causing us to be hissed and driven away from her through the air! But I am no woman if she keep her hold on this great fortune: and if the insult done us has touched thee too, take we counsel together. Meanwhile let us hold our peace, and know naught of her, alive or dead. For they are not truly happy of whose happiness other folk are unaware."

And the bridegroom, whom still she knows not, warns her thus a second time, as he talks with her by night: "Seest thou what peril besets thee? Those cunning wolfs have made ready for thee their snares, of which the sum is that they persuade thee to search into the fashion of my countenance, the seeing of which, as I have told thee often, will be the seeing of it no more forever. But do thou neither listen nor make answer to aught regarding thy husband. Besides, we have sown also the seed of our race. Even now this bosom grows with a child to be born to us, a child, if thou but keep our secret, of divine quality ; if thou profane it, subject to death." And Psyche was glad at the tidings, rejoicing in that solace of a divine seed, and in the glory of that pledge of love to be, and the dignity of the name of mother. Anxiously she noted the increase of the days, the waning months. And again, as he tarries briefly beside her, the bridegroom repeats his warning: "Even now the sword is drawn with which thy sisters seek thy life. Have pity on thyself, sweet wife, and upon our child, and see not those evil women again." But the sisters made their way once more into the palace, and cried to her in wily tones, "O ! Psyche ! and thou too wilt be a mother ! How great will be the joy at home ! Happy indeed shall we be to have the nursing of the golden child. Truly if he be answerable to the beauty of his parents, it will be a birth of Cupid himself."

So, little by little, they stole upon the soul of their sister. She, meanwhile, bids the lyre to sound for their delight and the playing is heard. She bids the pipes to move and the quire to sing, and the music and the singing come invisibly, soothing the mind of the listener with sweetest modulation. But not even thereby was their malice put to sleep: once more they seek to know what manner of husband she has and whence that seed. And Psyche, simple over-much, forgetting her first story, answers, "My husband comes from a far country, trading for great sums. He is already of middle age, with whitening locks." And therewith she dismisses them again.

And returning home upon the soft breath of Zephyrus, one cried to the other, "What shall be said of so ugly a lie? He who was a young man with florid beard is now in middle life. It must be that she told a false tale: else is she indeed ignorant what manner of man he is. Howsoever it be, let us destroy her quickly. For if she indeed knows not, be sure that her bridegroom is one of the gods; it is a god she bears in her womb. And let that be far from us! If she be called mother of a god, then will my life be more than I can bear."

So, full of rage against her, they returned to Psyche, and said to her craftily, "Thou livest in an ignorant bliss, all incurious of thy real danger. It is a deadly serpent, as we certainly know, that comes to sleep by thy side. Remember the words of the oracle, which declared thee destined to a cruel beast. There are those who have seen it at nightfall, coming back from its feeding. It will be not much longer, they say, ere it will end its blandishments. It but waits for the babe to be formed in thee, that it may devour thee by so much the richer. If indeed the solitude of this musical place, or it may be the loathsome commerce of this hidden love, delight thee, we at least with sisterly piety have done our part." And at last the unhappy Psyche, so simple and frail of soul, was carried away by the terror of their words, and losing memory of her husband's precepts and her own promise, brought upon herself a great calamity. Trembling and turning pale she answers them, "And they who tell those things, it may be, speak the truth. For in very deed never have I seen the face of my husband, nor know I at all what manner of man he is. Always he frights me diligently from the sight of him, threatening some great evil should I too curiously look upon his face. Do ye, if ye can help your sister in her great peril, stand by her now."

Her sisters answered her, "The way of safety we have well considered, and will teach thee. Take a sharp knife, and hide it in that part of the couch where thou art wont to lie ; take also a lamp filled with oil, and set it privily behind the curtain. And when he shall have drawn up his coils into the accustomed place, and thou hearest him breathe in sleep, slip then from his side and discover the lamp, and, knife in hand, put forth all thy strength, and strike off the serpent's head." And so they departed in haste.

And Psyche left alone (alone but for the furies which beset her) is tossed up and down in her distress, like a wave of the sea ; and though her will is firm, yet, in the moment of putting hand to the deed, she falters, and is torn asunder by various apprehension of that great calamity upon her. She hastens and anon delays ; is now full of distrust and now of angry courage : under one bodily form she loathes the monster, and loves the bridegroom. But evening ushers in the night ; and at last in haste she makes ready for the terrible deed. Darkness came, and the bridegroom ; and he first, after some faint essay of love, fell into a deep sleep.

And she, erewhile of no strength, the hard purpose of destiny assisting her, is confirmed in force. With lamp plucked forth, and the knife in her hand, she put by her sex ; and lo ! as the secrets of the bed became manifest, the sweetest and most gentle of all creatures, Cupid himself, reclined there, in his own proper loveliness ! At the sight of him, the very flame of the lamp kindled more gladly ! But Psyche was afraid at the vision, and, faint of soul, trembled backward upon her knees, and would have hidden away the steel in her own bosom. But the knife slipped from her hand : and now, undone, yet oftentimes looking upon the beauty of that divine countenance, she lives again. She sees the locks of that golden head, pleasant with the unction of the gods, shed down in graceful entanglement behind and before, about the ruddy cheeks and white throat. The pinions of the winged god, yet fresh with the dew, are spotless upon his shoulders ; the delicate plumage wavering over them as they lie at rest. Smooth he was, and, touched with light, worthy of Venus his mother. At the foot of the couch lay his bow and arrows, the instruments of his power, propitious to men

And Psyche, gazing hungrily upon all that, drew an arrow from the quiver, and trying its point upon her thumb, tremulous still, drave in the barb, so that a drop of blood came forth. Thus fell she, by her own act, and unaware, into the love of Love. Falling upon the bridegroom, with indrawn breath and a hurry of kisses from her eager and open lips, she shuddered as she thought how brief that sleep might be. And it chanced that a drop of burning oil fell from the lamp upon the god's shoulder. Ah! maladroit minister of love, thus to wound him from whom all fire comes; though 'twas a lover, I trow, first devised thee, to have the fruit of his desire even in the darkness! At the touch of the fire the god started up, and beholding the overthrow of her faith, quietly took flight from her embraces.

And Psyche, as he rose upon the wing, laid hold on him with her two hands, and hung upon him in his passage through the air, till she sank to the earth through weariness. And as she lay there, the divine lover, tarrying still, lighted upon a cypress tree which grew near, and, from the top of it, spake thus to her, in great emotion. "Foolish one! unmindful of the command of Venus, my mother, who had devoted thee to the bed of one of base degree, I fled to thee in his stead. Now know I that that was vainly done. Into mine own flesh pierced mine arrow, and I made thee my wife, only that I might seem a monster beside thee—that thou shouldst seek to wound the head wherein lay the eyes so full of love to thee! Again and again, I thought to put thee on thy guard concerning these things, and warned thee in loving kindness. Now I would but punish thee by my flight hence." And therewith he winged his way into the deep sky Psyche, prostrate upon the earth, and following far as sight might reach the flight of the bridegroom, wept and lamented ; and when the breadth of space had parted him wholly from her, cast herself down from the bank of a river which was near. But the stream, turning gentle in honor of the god, put her forth again unhurt upon its margin. And as it happened, Pan, the rustic god, was sitting just then by the waterside, embracing, in the body of a reed, the goddess Canna ; teaching her to respond to him in all varieties of slender sound. Hard by, his flock of goats browsed at will. And the shaggy god called her, wounded and outworn, kindly to him and said, " I am but a rustic herdsman, pretty maiden, yet wise, by favor of my great age and long experience ; and, if I guess truly by those faltering steps, by thy sorrowful eyes and continual sighing, thou laborest with excess of love. Listen then to me, and seek not death again, in the stream or otherwise. Put aside thy woe, and turn thy prayers to Cupid. He is in truth a delicate youth : win him by the delicacy of thy service."

So the shepherd-god spoke, and Psyche, answering nothing, but with a reverence to his serviceable deity, went on her way. And while she, in her search after Cupid, wandered through many lands, he was lying in the chamber of his mother, heart-sick. And the white bird which floats over the waves plunged in haste into the sea, and approaching Venus as she bathed, made known to her that her son lies afflicted with some grievous hurt, doubtful of life. And Venus cried, angrily, "My son, then, has a mistress! And it is Psyche, who witched away my beauty and was the rival of my godhead, whom he loves!"

Therewith she issued from the sea, and returning to her golden chamber, found there the lad, sick, as she had heard, and cried from the doorway, "Well done, truly! to trample thy mother's precepts under foot, to spare my enemy that cross of an unworthy love; nay, unite her to thyself, child as thou art, that I might have a daughter-in-law who hates me! I will make thee repent of thy sport, and the savor of thy marriage bitter. There is one who shall chasten that body of thine, put out thy torch and unstring thy bow. Not till she has plucked forth that hair, into which so oft these hands have smoothed the golden light, and sheared away thy wings, shall I feel the injury done me avenged." And with that, she hastened in anger from the doors."

And Ceres and Juno met her, and sought to know the meaning of her troubled countenance. "Ye come in season," she cried; "I pray you, find for me Psyche. It must needs be that ye have heard the disgrace of my house." And they, ignorant of what was done, would have soothed her anger, saying, "What fault, Mistress! hath thy son committed, that thou wouldst destroy the girl he loves? Knowest thou not that he is now of age? Because he wears his years so lightly must he seem to thee ever but a child? Wilt thou forever thus pry into the pastimes of thy son, always accusing his wantonness, and blaming in him those delicate wiles which are all thine own?" Thus, in secret fear of the boy's bow, did they seek to please him with their gracious patronage. But Venus, angry at their light taking of her wrongs, turned her back upon them; and with hasty steps took her way once more to the sea.

And in the meanwhile, Psyche, tost in soul, wandering hither and thither, rested not night nor day, in the pursuit of her husband, desiring, if she might not soothe his anger by the endearments of a wife, at the least to propitiate him with the prayers of a handmaid. And seeing a certain temple on the top of a high mountain, she said, "Who knows whether yonder place be not the abode of my lord?" Thither, therefore, she turned her steps; hastening now the more because desire and hope pressed her on, weary as she was with the labors of the way; and so, painfully measuring out the highest ridges of the mountain, she drew near to the sacred couches. She sees ears of wheat, in heaps or twisted into chaplets; ears of barley also: and there were sickles and all the instruments of harvest, lying there in disorder, thrown at random from the hands of the laborers in the great heat. These she curiously sets apart, one by one, duly ordering them; for she said within herself, "I may not neglect the shrines, nor the holy service, of any god there be, but much rather win by supplication the kindly mercy of them all."

And Ceres found her as she bent sadly on her task, and cried aloud, "Alas, Psyche! Venus, in the furiousness of her anger, tracks thy footsteps through the world, seeking for thee to pay her the utmost penalty; and thou, thinking of anything rather than thine own safety, hast taken on thee the care of what belongs to me!" Then Psyche fell down at her feet, and sweeping the floor with her hair, and washing the footsteps of the goddess with her tears, besought her mercy, with many prayers:—"By the gladdening rites of harvest, by the lighted lamps and mystic marches of the Marriage and mysterious Invention of thy daughter Proserpine, and by all beside that the holy place of Attica veils in silence, minister, I pray thee, to the sorrowful heart of Psyche! Suffer me to hide myself but for a few days among the heaps of corn, till time has softened the anger of the goddess, and my strength, out-worn in my long travail, be recovered by a little rest."

But Ceres answered her, "Truly thy tears move me, and I would fain help thee; only I dare not incur the ill-will of my kinswoman. Depart hence as quickly as may be." And Psyche, repelled against hope, and afflicted now with twofold sorrow, making her way back again, beheld among the half-lighted woods of the valley below a sanctuary builded with cunning art. And that she might lose no way of hope, howsoever doubtful, she drew near to the sacred doors. She sees there gifts of price, and garments fixed upon the door-posts and to the branches of the trees, wrought with letters of gold which told the name of the goddess to whom they were dedicated, with thanksgiving for that she had done. So, with bent knee and hands laid about the glowing altar, she prayed saying, "Sister and spouse of Jupiter! be thou to these my desperate fortunes, Juno the Auspicious! I know that thou dost willingly help those in travail with child; deliver me from the peril that is upon me." And as she prayed thus, Juno in the majesty of her godhead, was straightway present, and answered, "Would that I might incline favorably to thee; but against the will of Venus, whom I have ever loved as a daughter, I may not, for very shame, grant thy prayer."

And Psyche, dismayed by this new shipwreck of her hope, communed thus with herself, "Whither, from the midst of the snares that beset me, shall I take my way once more? In what dark solitude shall I hide me from the all-seeing eye of Venus? What if I put on at length a man's courage, and yielding myself unto her as my mistress, soften by a humility not yet too late the fierceness of her purpose? Who knows but that I may find him also whom my soul seeketh after, in the abode of his mother?"

And Venus, renouncing all earthly aid in her search, prepared to return to heaven. She ordered the chariot to be made ready, which Vulcan had wrought for her as a marriage-gift, with a cunning of hand which left his work so much the richer by the weight of gold it had lost under his tool. From the multitude which housed about the bed-chamber of their mistress, white doves came forth, and with joyful motions bent their painted necks beneath the yoke. Behind it, with playful riot, the sparrows sped onward, with other birds sweet of song, making known by their soft notes the approach of the goddess. Eagle and cruel hawk alarmed not the quireful family of Venus. And the clouds broke away, as the uttermost ether opened to receive her, daughter and goddess, with great joy.

And Venus passed straightway to the house of Jupiter to beg of him the use of Mercury, the god of Speech. And Jupiter refused not her prayer. And Venus and Mercury descended from heaven together; and as they went, the former said to the latter, "Thou knowest, my brother of Arcady, that never at any time have I done anything without thy help; for how long time, moreover, I have sought a certain maiden in vain. And now naught remains but that, by thy heraldry, I proclaim a reward for whomsoever shall find her. Do thou my bidding quickly." And with that she conveyed to him a little scrip, in the which was written the name of Psyche, with other things; and so returned home.

And Mercury failed not in his office; but departing into all lands, proclaimed that whosoever should deliver up to Venus the fugitive girl, should receive from herself seven kisses—one thereof full of the inmost honey of her throat. With that the doubt of Psyche was ended. And now, as she came near to the doors of Venus, one of the household, whose name was Use-and-Wont, ran out to her, crying, "Hast thou learned, Wicked Maid! now at last! that thou hast a mistress?" And seizing her roughly by the hair, drew her into the presence of Venus. And when Venus saw her, she cried out, saying, "Thou hast deigned then to make thy salutations to thy mother-in-law. Now will I in turn treat thee as becometh a dutiful daughter-in-law!"

And she took barley and millet and poppy-seed, every kind of grain and seed, and mixed them together, and laughed, and said to her: "Methinks so plain a maiden can earn lovers only by industrious ministry: now will I also make trial of thy service. Sort me this heap of seed, the one kind from the others, grain by grain; and get thy task done before the evening." And Psyche, stunned by the cruelty of her bidding, was silent, and moved not her hand to the inextricable heap. And there came forth a little ant, which had understanding of the difficulty of her task, and took pity upon the consort of the god of Love: and he ran deftly hither and thither, and called together the whole army of his fellows. "Have pity," he cried, "nimble scholars of the Earth, mother of all things! have pity upon the wife of Love, and hasten to help her in her perilous effort." Then, one upon the other, the hosts of the insect people hurried together; and they sorted asunder the whole heap of seed, separating every grain after its kind, and so departed quickly out of sight.

And at nightfall Venus returned, and seeing that task finished with so wonderful diligence, she cried, "The work is not thine, thou naughty maid, but his in whose eyes thou hast found favor." And calling her again in the morning, "See now the grove," she said, "beyond yonder torrent. Certain sheep feed there, whose fleeces shine with gold. Fetch me straightway a lock of that precious stuff, having gotten it as thou mayst."

And Psyche went forth willingly, not to obey the command of Venus, but even to seek a rest from her labor in the depths of the river. But out of the river, the green reed, lowly mother of music, spake to her: "O! Psyche, pollute not these waters by thy destruction, and approach not that terrible flock; for, as the heat groweth, they wax fierce: lie down under yon plane-tree, till the quiet of the river's breath have soothed them. Thereafter thou mayst shake down the fleecy gold from the trees of the grove, for it holdeth by the leaves."

And Psyche, instructed thus by the simple reed, in the humanity of its heart, filled her bosom with the soft golden stuff, and returned to Venus. But the goddess smiled bitterly, and said to her, "Well know I who was the author of this thing also. I will make further trial of thy discretion, and the boldness of thy heart. Seest thou the utmost peak of yonder steep mountain. The dark stream which flows down thence waters the Stygian fields, and swells the stream of Cocytus. Bring me now, in this little urn, a draught from its innermost source." And therewith she put into her hands a vessel of wrought crystal.

And Psyche set forth in haste on her way to the mountain, looking there at last to find the end of her hapless life. But when she came to the region which borders on the cliff pointed out to her, she understood the deadly nature of her task. From a great rock, steep and slippery, a horrible river of water poured forth, falling straightway down a channel exceeding narrow into the unseen gulf below. And lo! creeping from the rocks on either hand, angry serpents, with their long necks and sleepless eyes. The very waters found a voice and bade her depart, in smothered cries of, Depart hence! and What doest thou here? Look around thee! and Destruction is upon thee! And then sense left her, in the immensity of her peril, as one changed to stone.

But not even then did the distress of that innocent soul escape the steady eyes of a gentle providence. For the bird of Jupiter spread his wings and took flight to her, and asked her, "Didst thou think, simple one, even thou! that thou couldst steal one drop of that relentless stream, the most holy river of Styx, terrible even to the gods? But give me thine urn." And the bird took the urn, and filled it at the source, and returned to her quickly from among the teeth of the serpents, bringing with him of the waters, all unwilling—nay! warning him to depart away and not molest them.

And she, receiving the urn with great joy, ran back quickly that she might deliver it to Venus, and yet again satisfied not the angry goddess. "My child!" she said, "in this one thing further must thou serve me. Take now this tiny casket, and get thee down even unto hell, and deliver it to Proserpine. Tell her that Venus would have of her beauty, so much at least as may suffice for but one day's use; that beauty she possessed erewhile being foreworn and spoiled, through her tendance upon the sick-bed of her son; and be not slow in returning."

And Psyche perceived there the last ebbing of her fortune—that she was now thrust openly upon death, who must go down, of her own motion, to Hades and the Shades. And straightway she climbed to the top of an exceeding high tower, thinking within herself, "I will cast myself down thence; so shall I descend most quickly into the kingdom of the dead." And the tower, again, broke forth into speech: "Wretched Maid! Wretched Maid! Wilt thou destroy thyself? If the breath quit thy body, then wilt thou indeed go down into Hades, but by no means return hither. Listen to me. Among the pathless wilds not far from this place, lies a certain mountain, and therein one of hell's vent-holes. Through the yawning breach a rough way lies open, following which thou wilt come, by direct course, to the castle of Orcus. And thou must not go empty-handed. Take in each hand a morsel of barley-bread, soaked in hydromel; and in thy mouth two pieces of money. And when thou shalt be now well onward in the way of death, thou wilt overtake a lame ass laden with wood, and a lame driver, who will beg thee to reach him certain cords to fasten the burden which is falling from the ass ; but be thou cautious to pass on in silence. And soon as thou comest to the river of the dead, Charon, in that crazy bark he hath, will put thee over upon the further side. There is greed even among the dead : and thou shalt deliver to him, for the ferrying, one of those two pieces of money, in such wise that he take it with his hand from between thy lips. And as thou passest over the stream, a dead old man, rising on the water, will put up to thee his moldering hands, and pray thee to draw him into the ferry-boat. But beware that thou yield not to unlawful pity.

“ When thou hast crossed, and art upon the causeway, certain aged women, spinning, will cry to thee to lend thy hand to their work : and beware again that thou take no part therein ; for this also is the snare of Venus, whereby she would cause thee to cast away one at least of those cakes thou bearest in thy hands. And think not that a slight matter ; for the loss of either one of them will be to thee the losing of the light of day. For a watch-dog exceeding fierce lies ever before the threshold of that lonely house of Proserpine. Close his mouth with one of thy cakes ; so shalt thou pass by him, and enter straightway into the presence of Proserpine herself. Then, do thou deliver thy message, and taking what she shall give thee, return back again ; offering to the watch-dog the other cake, and to the ferryman that other piece of money thou holdest in thy mouth. After this manner mayest thou return again beneath the stars. But withal, I charge thee, think not to look into, nor open, the casket thou bearest, with that treasure of the beauty of the divine countenance hidden therein."

So spake the stones of the tower; and Psyche delayed not, but proceeding diligently after the manner enjoined, entered into the house of Proserpine, at whose feet she sat down humbly, and would neither the delicate couch nor that divine food which the goddess offered her, but did straightway the business of Venus. And Proserpine filled the casket secretly, and shut the lid, and delivered it to Psyche, who fled therewith from Hades with new strength. But coming back into the light of day, even as she hasted now to the ending of her service, she was seized by a rash curiosity. "Lo! now," she said within herself, "my simpleness! who bearing in my hands the divine loveliness, heed not to touch myself with a particle at least therefrom, that I may please the more by the favor of it my fair one, my beloved." Even as she spoke, she lifted the lid; and behold! within, neither beauty, nor anything beside, save sleep only, the sleep of the dead, which took hold upon her, filling all her members with its drowsy vapor, so that she lay down in the way and moved not, as in the slumber of death.

And Cupid, his wound being now healed, because he would endure no longer the absence of her he loved, gliding through the narrow window of the chamber wherein he was holden, his pinions being now repaired with a little rest, fled forth swiftly upon them ; and coming to the place where Psyche was, shook that sleep away from her, and set him in his prison again, awaking her with the innocent point of his arrow. "Lo! now, thine old error again," he said to her, "which had like once more to have destroyed thee! But do thou now what is lacking of the command of my mother; the rest shall be my care." With these words, the lover rose upon the air; and being consumed inwardly with the greatness of his love, penetrated with vehement wing into the highest place of heaven, to lay his cause before the father of the gods. And the father of gods took his hand in his, and kissed his face, and said to him, "At no time, my son, hast thou regarded me with due honor. Often hast thou vexed my bosom, wherein lies the disposition of the stars, with those busy darts of thine. Nevertheless, because thou hast grown up between these mine hands, I will accomplish thy desire." And straightway he bade Mercury to call the gods together; and, the council-chamber being filled, sitting upon a high throne, "Ye gods," he said, "all ye whose names are in the white book of the Muses, ye know yonder lad. It seems good to me that his youthful heats should by some means be restrained. And that all occasion may be taken from him, I would even confine him in the bonds of marriage. He has chosen and embraced a mortal maiden. Let him have fruit of her love, and possess her forever."

And thereupon he bade Mercury produce Psyche in heaven; and holding out to her his ambrosial cup, "Take it," he said, "and live forever: nor shall Cupid ever depart from thee." And the gods sat down together to the marriage-feast. On the first couch lay the bridegroom, and Psyche in his bosom. His rustic serving-boy bare the wine to Jupiter; and Bacchus to the rest. The Seasons crimsoned all things with their roses. Apollo sang to the lyre, while a little Pan prattled on his reeds, and Venus danced very sweetly to the soft music. Thus, with due rites, did Psyche pass into the power of Cupid; and from them was born the daughter whom men call Voluptas.

CHAPTER VI.

EUPHUISM.

So the famous story composed itself in the memory of Marius, with an expression changed in some ways from the original and on the whole graver. The petulant, boyish Cupid of Apuleius had become something more like that "Lord, of terrible aspect," who stood at Dante's bedside and wept; or at least he had grown to the manly earnestness of the so-called Eros of Praxiteles. Set in relief amid the coarser matter of the book, this episode of Cupid and Psyche served to combine many lines of meditation, already familiar to Marius, into the ideal of a perfect imaginative love, centered upon a type of beauty entirely flawless and clean—an ideal which never wholly faded out of his thoughts, though he valued it at various times in different degrees. The human body in its beauty, as the highest potency of all beauty in material objects, seemed to him just then to be matter no longer; but, having taken celestial fire, to assert itself as indeed the true, though visible, soul or spirit in things. In contrast with that ideal, in all the pure brilliancy and, as it were, in the happy light of youth and morning and the spring-tide, men's real loves, with which at many points the book brings one into close contact, appeared to him, like the actual tenor of their lives for the most part, somewhat mean and sordid. The hiddenness of perfect things; a shrinking delicacy and mysticism of sentiment of the kind so well expressed in Psyche's tremulous hope concerning the child to be born of the husband she has never yet seen—in the face of this little child, at the least, shall I apprehend thine—in hoc saltem parvulo cognoscam faciem tuam; the fatality which seems to haunt any signal beauty, whether moral or physical, as if it were in itself something illicit and isolating; the suspicion and hatred it so often excites in the vulgar—these were some of the impressions, forming, as they do, a constant tradition of somewhat cynical pagan sentiment, from Medusa and Helen downwards, which the old story enforced on him. A book, like a person, has its fortunes with one; is lucky or unlucky in the precise moment of its falling in our way, and often by some happy accident ranks with us for something more than its independent value. The Metamorphoses of Apuleius, coming to Marius just then, figured for him as indeed The golden book; he felt a sort of personal gratitude to its writer, and saw in it doubtless far more than was really there for any other reader. It occupied always a peculiar place in his remembrance, never quite losing its power in repeated returns to it for the revival of that first glowing impression.

Its effect upon the elder youth was a more practical one: it stimulated the literary ambition, already so strong a motive with him, by a signal example of success, and made him more than ever an ardent, indefatigable student of words, of the means or instrument of the literary art. The secrets of utterance, of expression itself, of that through which alone any intellectual or spiritual power within one can actually take effect upon others, to over-awe or charm them to one's side, presented themselves to this ambitious lad in immediate connection with that same desire for predominance, for the satisfaction of which another might have relied on the acquisition and display of brilliant military qualities. In him, a fine instinctive sentiment of the exact value and power of words was connate with the eager longing for sway over others. He saw himself already a gallant and effective leader, innovating or conservative as occasion might require, in the rehabilitation of the mother tongue, then fallen so tarnished and languid; yet the sole object, as he mused within himself, of the only sort of patriotic feeling proper, or possible, for one born of slaves. The popular speech was gradually departing from the form and rule of literary language, a language always and increasingly somewhat artificial. While the learned dialect was yearly becoming more and more barbarously pedantic, the colloquial idiom, on the other hand, offered a thousand chance-tost gems of racy or picturesque expression, rejected or at least un-gathered by what claimed to be classical Latin. The time was coming when neither the pedants nor the people would really understand Cicero: though there were some indeed, like this new writer Apuleius, who, departing from the custom of writing in Greek, which had been a fashionable affectation among the sprightlier wits since the days of Hadrian, had written in the vernacular.

The literary program which Flavian had already designed for himself would be a work, then, partly conservative or reactionary, in its dealing with the instrument of the literary art; partly popular and revolutionary, asserting, so to term them, the rights of the proletariate of speech. More than fifty years before, the younger Pliny, himself an effective witness for the delicate power of the Latin tongue, had said, "I am one of those who admire the ancients, yet I do not, like some others, underrate certain instances of genius which our own times afford. For it is not true that nature, as if weary and effete, no longer produces what is admirable." And he, Flavian, would prove himself the true master of the opportunity thus indicated. In his desire for a not too distant fame, he dreamed over all that, as the young Cæsar may have dreamed of campaigns. Others might brutalize or neglect the native speech, that true "open field" for charm and sway over men:—he would make of it a serious study, weighing the precise power of every phrase and word, as though it were precious metal, going back to the original and native sense of each, disentangling its later associations, restoring to full significance all its wealth of latent figurative expression, reviving or replacing its outworn or tarnished images. Latin literature and the Latin tongue were dying of routine and languor; and what was necessary, first of all, was to re-establish the natural and direct relationship between thought and expression, between the sensation and the term; and restore to words their primitive power.

For words, after all, words manipulated with all his delicate force, were to be the apparatus of a war for himself. To be forcibly impressed, in the first place; and in the second, to find means of making visible to others that which was vividly apparent, delightful, of lively interest to himself, to the exclusion of all that was but middling, tame, or but half-true even to him—this scrupulousness of literary art actually awoke in Flavian, for the first time, a sort of chivalrous conscience. What care for style! what patience of execution! what research for the significant tones of ancient idiom—sonantia verba et antiqua! What stately and regular word-building—gravis et decora constructio! He felt the whole meaning of the skeptical Pliny's somewhat melancholy advice to one of his friends—to seek in literature deliverance from mortality—ut studiis se literarum a mortalitate vindicet. And there was everything in the nature and the training of Marius to make him a full participator in the hopes of such a new literary school, with Flavian for its leader. In those refinements of his curious spirit, in that horror of profanities, in that fastidious sense of a correctness in external form, there was something which ministered to the old ritual interest, still surviving in him ; as if here indeed were involved a kind of sacred service to the mother-tongue.

It was the principle of Euphuism, as manifested in every age in which the literary conscience has been awakened to forgotten duties towards language, towards the instruments of expression ; and in reality does but modify a little the principles of all effective expression at all times. 'Tis art's function to conceal itself : ars est celare artem—is a saying, which, exaggerated by inexact quotation, has perhaps been oftenest and most confidently quoted by those who have had little literary or other art to conceal ; and from the very beginning of professional literature, the "labor of the file"—a labor in the case of Plato, for instance, or Virgil, like that of the oldest of goldsmiths as described by Apuleius, enriching the work by far more than the weight of the precious metal it removed—has always had its function. Sometimes, of course, as in later examples of it, this Roman Euphuism, with its determination at any cost to aim at beauty in writing—ἐς κάλλος γράφειν—lapsed into its characteristic fopperies or mannerisms, really the mere "defects of its qualities," indeed ; not wholly unpleasing perhaps, or at least excusable, when looked at as but the toys—as Cicero called them—the strictly congenial and appropriate toys—of an assiduously cultivated age, which could not help being polite, critical, self-conscious. A mere love of novelty also had doubtless its part there ; as with the Euphuism of the Elizabethan age, and of the modern French romanticists, its neologies formed the subject of one of the charges against it; though indeed, as regards these tricks of taste also, there is nothing new, but a quaint family likeness rather, between the Euphuists of successive ages. Here, as elsewhere, the power of "fashion," as it is called, is but one minor form, slight enough it may be, yet distinctly symptomatic, of that deeper yearning of human nature towards an ideal perfection, which is a continuous force in it; and since here too human nature is limited, such fashions must necessarily reproduce themselves. Among other resemblances to later growths of Euphuism, its archaisms on the one hand, and its neologies on the other, the Euphuism of the days of Marcus Aurelius had, in the composition of verse, its fancy for the refrain. It was a snatch from a popular chorus, something he had heard sounding all over the town of Pisa one April night, one of the first bland and summer-like nights of the year, that Flavian had chosen for the refrain of a poem he was then pondering—the Per-vigilium Veneris—the vigil, or "nocturn" of Venus.

Certain elderly counselors, filling what is a constant part in the little tragi-comedy which literature and its votaries are playing in all ages, would ask, suspecting some unreality or affectation in that minute culture of form:—Cannot those who have anything to say, say it directly? Why not be broad and simple, like the old writers of Greece? And that challenge at least set his thoughts at work on the intellectual situation, as it lay between the children of the present and those earliest masters. Certainly, the most wonderful, the unique point, about the Greek genius, in literature as in everything else, had been the utter absence of imitation in its productions. How had the burden of precedent, laid upon every artist, increased since then! It was all around one—that smoothly built world of old classical taste, an accomplished fact, with an overwhelming authority on every point of the conduct of one's work. With no fardel on its own back, yet so imperious to those who labored after it, Hellas, in its early freshness, looked as distant from him even then, as it does from ourselves. There might seem to be no place left for novelty or originality; place only for a patient, infinite faultlessness. On this point too Flavian passed through a world of curious art-casuistries and even self-tormentings, at the threshold of his work. Was poetic beauty a thing ever one and the same, and an absolute type; or, changing always with the soul of time itself, did it depend upon the taste, the peculiar trick of apprehension, the fashion, as we say, of every successive age? Might one recover the earlier manner and sense of it, by a masterly effort to recall all the complexities of the life, moral and intellectual, of an earlier age? Had there been really bad ages in art and literature? Were all ages—even those earliest, adventurous, matutinal days—in themselves equally poetical or unpoetical; and poetry, the literary beauty, the poetic ideal, always but a borrowed light upon men's actual life?

Homer had said—

Οἱ δ' ὅτε δὴ λιμένος πολυβενθέος ἐντὸς ἵκοντο, Ἰστία μὲν στείλαντο, θέσαν δ' ἐν νηὶ μελαίνῃ . . . .
 κ δὲ καὶ αὐτοὶ βαῖνον ἐπὶ ῥηγμῖνι θαλάσσης.

And how poetic the simple incident seemed, told just thus! Homer was always telling things in this manner. And one might think there had been no effort there; that it was but the almost mechanical transcript of a time intrinsically and naturally poetic in itself, in which one could hardly have spoken at all without ideal effect, or the sailors have pulled down their boat without making a picture in "the great style," against a sky charged with marvels. Must not an age, itself thus ideal, have counted for more than half of the whole work? Or might the closer reader discover even here, even in Homer, a really mediatorial function of the poet between the reader and the actual matter of his experience; the poet waiting, as it were, in an age which really felt itself trite and commonplace enough, on his opportunity for the touch of "golden alchemy," or at least for the lighted side of the things themselves? Might not another, in one's own prosaic and used-up time, so uneventful as it had been through the long reign of those quiet Antonines, in like manner, discover his ideal, by a due waiting upon it? Would not a generation to come, looking back upon this, under the power of the enchanted-distance fallacy, find it ideal to view, in contrast with its own languor—the languor that for some reason (concerning which Augustine will one day have his view) seemed to haunt men always? Had Homer, even, appeared unreal and affected in his poetic flight, to some of the people of his day; as seemed to happen with every new literature in turn? In any case, the intellectual conditions of early Greece had been—how different from these!—and a true literary tact would accept that difference, in forming the primary conception of the literary function, in a later time. Perhaps the utmost one could get by conscious effort, in the way of a reaction or return to the conditions of an earlier and fresher age, would be but novitas—artificial artlessness—naïveté; and that quality too might have its measure of euphuistic charm, direct and sensible enough; though it must count, in comparison with the genuine early Greek newness at the beginning, not as the freshness of the open fields, but only of a bunch of field-flowers in a heated room.

Meantime, there was all this: on the one side, the pagan world—for us but a fragment, for him an accomplished but present fact; still a living, united, organic whole, in the entirety of its art, its religions, its thoughts, its sagacious forms of polity; that so weighty authority it exercised on every point, being, really, only the measure of its charm for every one—on the other side, the actual world in all its ardent self-assertion: and Flavian himself, with all his abounding animation, there, in the midst of the situation. From the natural defects, the littlenesses which may appear connate with the euphuistic scheme which just then so strongly influenced him, he was saved by the consciousness that he had a matter to present, very real, at least to himself. His dilettanteism, his assiduous preoccupation with what might seem but the details of mere form or manner, was, after all, bent upon the function of bringing to the surface, sincerely and in their integrity, certain strong personal intuitions, certain visions or apprehensions of things as being, with important results, in this way rather than in that—apprehensions which the artistic or literary expression was called upon to follow, with the exactness of wax or clay, clothing the model within it. Flavian too, with his fine, clear mastery of the practically effective, had early laid hold of the principle, as axiomatic in literature—That to know when one's self is interested, is the first condition of interesting other people. It was a principle, the forcible apprehension of which made him jealous and fastidious in the selection of his intellectual food; often listless while others read or gazed diligently; never pretending to be moved out of mere complaisance to other people's emotions: it served to foster in him a very scrupulous literary sincerity with himself. And it was that uncompromising demand for a matter in all art, of immediate derivation from lively personal intuition, that constant appeal to individual judgment, which kept his Euphuism, at its weakest, from sinking into a mere artifice.

Was the magnificent exordium of Lucretius, addressed to the goddess Venus, the work of his earlier manhood, and designed originally to open an argument less persistently somber than that protest against the whole pagan heaven which actually follows it? Certainly it is the most typical expression of a mood, which still, with little modification comes over the young poet, and as something peculiar to his youth, when he feels the sentimental current set so forcibly through his veins, and so much as a matter of purely physical excitement, that he can hardly distinguish it from the animation of external nature, the up-swelling of the seed in the earth, and of the sap through the trees. Flavian, to whom, again, as to his later euphuistic kinsmen, old mythology seemed as full of untried, unexpressed motives and interests as human life itself, had long been occupied with a kind of mystic hymn to the vernal principle of life in things; a composition shaping itself, little by little, out of a thousand dim perceptions, into singularly definite form (definite and firm as fine-art in metal, thought Marius) for which, as I said, he had caught his "refrain," from the lips of the young men singing, because they could not help it, in the streets of Pisa. And as it oftenest happens also, with natures of genuinely poetic quality, those piecemeal beginnings came suddenly to harmonious completeness among the fortunate incidents, the physical heat and light, and one singularly happy day.

It was one of the first hot days of March—the sacred day—on which from Pisa, as from many another harbor on the Mediterranean, the Ship of Isis went to sea, and every one walked down to the shore-side to witness the freighting and launching of the vessel, and its final abandonment by the mariners among the waves, as an object really devoted to the great goddess; the new rival or double of ancient Venus, and like her a favorite patroness of sailors. On the preceding night, all the world had been abroad to view the illumination of the river; the stately lines of houses on its shores being festooned with hundreds of many-colored lamps. The young men had been pouring out their chorus—

Cras amet qui nunquam amavit
Quique amavit cras amet—

as they carried their torches through the yielding crowd, or rowed their lanterned boats up and down the stream till far into the night, when heavy rain-drops had driven all lingerers within doors. Morning broke, however, smiling and serene; and the great procession started betimes. The slightly curving river, with the smoothly paved streets on either side of it, between the low marble parapet and the fair dwelling houses, formed together the main highway of the city; and the pageant, accompanied throughout by innumerable lanterns and wax tapers, took its course up one of these streets (crossing the water by a bridge, up-stream) and down the other, to the haven; every possible standing-place, out of doors and within, being crowded with sight-seers, of whom Marius was one of the most eager, deeply interested in finding the spectacle much as Apuleius had described it in his book, though on a scale less grand.

First of all, the master of ceremonies and his marshals, quietly waving back the crowd, made way for a number of women, who scattered flowers and perfumes. They were followed by a company of musicians, twanging and piping, on instruments the strangest Marius had ever beheld, the notes of a hymn, narrating the first origin of this votive ceremony, to a choir of white-vested youths, who marched behind them singing it. The tire-women and other personal attendants of the great goddess came next, bearing the instruments of their ministry, and various articles of her attire, wrought in the most precious material; some of them with long ivory combs, plying their hands and decking their hair, in wild yet graceful concert of movement, as they went, in sacred mimicry of her toilet. Placed in their rear were the mirror-bearers of the goddess, carrying large mirrors of beaten brass or silver, turned in such a way as to reflect to the great body of worshipers, who immediately followed them, the face of the sacred image, as it advanced on its way; and their faces to it, as though they were really coming to meet the divine presence. They comprehended a multitude of both sexes and all ages, who had been initiated into the divine mysteries, clad in fair linen; the females veiled, the males with shining tonsures; every one carrying a sistrum, the richer sort of silver, a few very dainty persons of fine gold, rattling the reeds as they proceeded, with a noise like the jargon of innumerable insects and chattering birds, just awakened out of torpor and come abroad in the spring sun. Then, borne upon a kind of platform, came the goddess herself, swaying up and down above the heads of the multitude as the bearers walked, in her mystic robe embroidered with the moon and stars, bordered gracefully with a fringe of real fruit and flowers, and with a glittering crown upon her head. The train of the procession consisted of the priests in long white vestments, close from head to foot, and composed into groups; each of which bore exposed aloft one of the sacred symbols of Isis—the corn-fan, the golden asp, the ivory hand of Equity—and among them Marius saw the votive ship itself, carved and gilt, and adorned bravely with flags flying. Last of all walked the high priest; the people kneeling as he passed, to kiss his hand, in which he carried those well-remembered roses.

Marius followed with the rest to the harbor, where the ship, lowered from the shoulders of the priests, was loaded with as much as it could carry of the rich spices and other costly gifts, offered in great profusion by the worshipers. And so, launched at last upon the water, the mystic vessel left the shore; crossing the harbor-bar in the wake of a much stouter vessel than itself, manned by a crew of white-robed mariners, whose function it was, at the appointed moment, finally to desert it on the open sea.

The remainder of the day was spent by most in parties on the water ; and Marius and Flavian sailed further than they had ever done before to a wild spot on the bay, the traditional site of a little Greek colony, which, having had its eager, stirring life in the days when Etruria was still a power in Italy, had perished in the time of the civil wars. In the absolute transparency of the air on this gracious day, an infinitude of detail from sea and shore reached the eye with sparkling clearness, as the two lads sped rapidly over the waves—Flavian at work suddenly, from time to time, with his tablets. They reached land at last. The coral-fishers had spread their nets on the sands, with a tumble-down of quaint, many-hued treasures, below a little shrine of Venus, fluttering and gay with the scarves and napkins and gilded shells, which these people had offered to the image. Flavian and Marius sat down under the shade of a mass of gray rock or ruin, where had been the sea-gate of the Greek town, and talked of life in those old Greek colonies. Of this place, all that remained, besides those rude stones, was—a handful of silver coins, each with a head of pure and archaic beauty, though a little cruel, supposed to represent the Siren Ligeia, whose tomb was formerly shown here—only those—and a song ; the very strain which Flavian had caught back in those last months. They were records which spoke, certainly, of the charm of life within those walls. How strong must have been the tide of men's existence in that little old republican town, so small that this circle of gray stones, of service now only by the moisture they gathered for the blue-flowering gentians among them, had been the line of its rampart; yet concentrating within it an epitome of all that was liveliest, most animated and adventurous, in the old Greek people of which it was a graft; and enhancing it, by concentration of all its many motives into smaller space. The band of "devoted youth"—λερά νεότης—of the younger brothers, devoted to the gods and whatever luck they might afford, because there was no room for them at home—went forth, bearing the sacred flame from the mother-hearth; itself a flame, of power to consume the whole material of existence in clear heat and light, and leave no smoldering residue. The life of those vanished townsmen, so brilliant and revolutionary, applying so abundantly the personal qualities which alone just then Marius seemed to value, associated itself with the actual figure of his companion, standing there before him, his face enthusiastic with the sudden thought of all that; and struck him vividly as what would have been precisely the fitting opportunity for a nature like his, so hungry for control, for personal ascendancy, over men. ✓

Marius noticed also, however, as high spirits flagged at last, on the way home through the heavy dew of the evening, more than physical fatigue, as he thought, in Flavian, who seemed to find no refreshment in the coolness. There had been something feverish, perhaps, and like the beginning of sickness, about his almost forced gayety, in this sudden heat of spring ; and by the evening of the next day he was lying with a burning spot on his forehead, stricken, as was thought from the first, by the terrible new disease.

CHAPTER VII.

PAGAN DEATH.

FOR the fantastical colleague of the philosophic emperor Marcus Aurelius, returning in triumph from the East, had brought in his train, among the enemies of Rome, one by no means a captive. People actually sickened, stricken by a sudden touch of the unsuspected foe, as they watched in dense crowds the grotesque or pathetic imagery of failure and success, in the triumphal procession. And as usual, the plague brought with it a power to develop all pre-existent germs of superstition. It was through a dishonor done to Apollo himself—said popular rumor—to Apollo, the old titular divinity of pestilence, that the poisonous thing had come abroad. Pent up in a golden coffer, consecrated to the god, it had escaped in the sacrilegious plundering of his temple at Seleucia by Verus's soldiers, after a traitorous surprise of that town and a cruel massacre. Certainly there was something which baffled all imaginable precautions, and all medical science, in the suddenness with which the disease broke out simultaneously, here and there, among both soldiers and citizens, even in places far remote from the main line of its grand march, in the rear of the victorious army. It seemed to have invaded the whole empire, and some have even thought that, in a mitigated form, it permanently remained there. In Rome itself many thousands perished; and old authorities tell of farm-steads, whole towns, and even entire neighborhoods, which from that time continued without inhabitants and lapsed into wildness or ruin.

Flavian lay at the open window of his lodging, with a burning pain in the head, fancying no covering light and thin enough to be applied to his body. His head being relieved after a time, there was distress at the chest. It was but the fatal course of the strange new sickness, under many disguises; traveling from the brain to the feet, like a material resident, weakening one after another of the organic centers; often, when it did not kill, depositing various degrees of life-long infirmity in this member or that; and after that descent, returning upwards again, now as a mortal coldness, leaving the entrenchments of the fortress of life overturned, one by one, behind it.

Flavian lay there, with the enemy at his breast now in a painful cough, but relieved from that burning fever in the brain, amid the rich-scented flowers—rare Pæstum roses, and the like—procured by Marius for his solace, in a fancied convalescence; and would, at intervals, return to work at his verses, with a great eagerness to complete and transcribe the poem, while Marius sat and wrote at his dictation, one of the latest but not the poorest specimens of genuine Latin poetry.

It was in truth a kind of nuptial hymn, which, taking its start from the thought of nature as the universal mother, celebrated the preliminary pairing, and mating together, of all fresh things, in the hot and genial spring-time—the immemorial nuptials of the soul of spring itself and the brown earth; and was full of a delighted, mystic sense of what passed between them in that fantastic marriage. And its mystic burden was relieved, at intervals, by the familiar playfulness of the Latin verse-writer dealing with mythology, which, coming at so late a day, had still a wonderful freshness in its old age—“Amor has put his weapons by and will keep holiday. He has been bidden to go unclad, that none may be wounded by his bow and arrows. But take care! In truth he is none the less armed than usual, though he be all unclad.”

In the expression of all this Flavian seemed, while making it his chief aim to retain the opulent, many-syllabled vocabulary of the Latin genius, at some points even to have advanced beyond it, in anticipation of wholly new laws of taste as regards sound—of a new range of sound itself; the note of which, associating itself with certain other fancies or experiences of his, was to Marius like the foretaste of an entirely novel world of poetic beauty to come. Flavian had caught, in fact, something of the rhyming cadence, the sonorous organ-music of the medieval Latin, and therewithal something of its unction and mysticity of spirit. There was in his work, along with the last splendor of the classical language, a touch, almost prophetic, of that transformed life it was to have in the rhyming middle age, just about to dawn. The impression thus forced upon Marius connected itself with a feeling, the precise inverse of that, known to every one, which seems to say—You have been just here, just thus, before!—a feeling, in his case, not reminiscent but prescient, which passed over him many times afterwards, coming across certain people and places; as if he detected there the process of actual change to a wholly undreamed of and renewed condition of human body and soul. It was as if he saw the heavy, yet decrepit old Roman architecture about him, rebuilding on an intrinsically better pattern.—Could it have been actually on a new musical instrument that Flavian had first heard those novel accents of his verse? And still Marius noticed there, amid all that richness of impression and imagery, the firmness of outline he had always relished so much, in the composition of Flavian—Yes! a firmness like that of some master of noble metal-work, manipulating tenacious bronze or gold. Even then, the haunting refrain, with its impromptu variations, from the throats of those strong young men, floated in at the window.

Cras amet qui nunquam amavit !
 Quique amavit cras amet !

—repeated Flavian, tremulously dictating yet one stanza more.

What he was losing, his freehold of a soul and a body so fortunately endowed, the mere liberty of life itself above-ground, "those sunny mornings in the cornfields, by the sea," as he recollected them one day, when the window was thrown open upon the early freshness—his sense of all that, was from the first very sharp and clear, yet still rather as of something he was but deprived of for a time than finally bidding farewell to. That was while he was still with no very grave misgiving as to the issue of his sickness, and felt the sources of life still springing essentially unadulterate within him. From time to time, indeed, Marius, working eagerly at the poem from his dictation, was haunted by a feeling of the triviality of such work just then. The recurrent sense of some obscure danger beyond the mere danger of death, vaguer than that and by so much the more terrible, like the menace of some shadowy adversary in the dark with whose mode of attack they were unacquainted, confused him now and again, through those hours of excited attention to his manuscript, and to the merely physical wants of Flavian. Still, for those three days there was much hope and cheerfulness, and even jesting. Half-consciously Marius tried to prolong one or another relieving circumstance of the day, the preparations for rest and for morning refreshment, for instance; somewhat sadly making the most of the little luxury of this or that, with something of the feigned cheer of the mother who sets her last morsels before her famished child as for a feast, but really that he "may eat it and die."

It was on the afternoon of the seventh day that he allowed Marius finally to put the unfinished manuscript aside. For the enemy, leaving the chest quiet at last, though exhausted, had made itself felt with full power again in a painful vomiting, which seemed to shake his body asunder, with great consequent prostration. From that time the distress increased rapidly downwards—omnia tum vero vitai claustra lababant—and soon the cold was mounting, with sure pace, from the dead feet to the head.

And now Marius began more than to suspect what the issue must be, and henceforward could but watch with a sort of agonized fascination the rapid but systematic work of the destroyer, faintly relieving a little the mere accidents of the sharper forms of the suffering. Flavian himself seemed, with full consciousness at last—with a clear, concentrated, jealous estimate of the actual crisis—to be doing battle with his enemy. His mind surveyed, with great distinctness, the various suggested modes of relief. He would certainly get better, he fancied, could he be removed to a certain place on the hills where as a child he had once recovered from sickness; but found that he could scarcely raise his head from the pillow without giddiness. And then, as if now clearly foreseeing the end, he would set himself, with an eager effort, and with that eager and angry look, which is noted as one of the premonitions of death in this disease, to fashion out, without formal dictation, still a few more broken verses of his unfinished work, in hard-set determination, defiant of pain, to arrest this or that little drop at least, from the river of sensuous imagery rushing so quickly past him.

But at length delirium—symptom that the enemy's work was done, and the last resort of life yielding to the plague—broke the coherent order of words and thoughts; and Marius, dwelling intently on the coming agony, found his best hope in the increasing dimness of the patient's mind. In intervals of clearer consciousness the visible signs of cold, of sorrow and desolation, were very painful. No longer battling with the disease, he seemed to be yielding himself, as it were, to the disposal of the victorious foe, and dying passively, like some dumb creature, in hopeless acquiescence at last. That old, half-pleading peevishness, actually unamiable, yet seeming only to need conditions of life a little happier than they had been, to become refinement of affection, and a delicate grace in its demand on the sympathy of others, had changed in those moments of full intelligence to a tremulous, clinging gentleness, as he lay—"on the very threshold of death"—with his sharply contracted hand in that of Marius, to his almost surprised happiness, winning him now to an absolutely self-forgetful devotion. There was a new sort of pleading in the misty eyes, just because they took such unsteady note of him, which made Marius feel as if guilty; anticipating a form of self-reproach which surprises sometimes even the tenderest ministrant, when, at death, the sudden cessation of affectionate labor gives time for the suspicion of some failure of love, perhaps, at one or another minute point in it. Marius almost longed to take his share in the suffering, that he might understand so the better how to relieve it.

It seemed that the light of the lamp distressed the patient, and Marius extinguished it. The thunder which had sounded all day among the hills, with a heat not unwelcome to Flavian, had given way at nightfall to steady rain ; and in the darkness Marius lay down beside him, faintly shivering now in the sudden cold, to lend him his own warmth, undeterred by the fear of contagion which had kept other people from passing near the house. At length about daybreak he perceived that the last effort had come with a restoration of mental clearness which recognized him (Marius understood this in the contact, light as it was) there, beside him. "Is it a comfort," he whispered then, "that I shall often come and weep over you?"—"Not unless I be aware of you there, and hear you weeping!"

The sun shone out on the people going to work for a long hot day, and Marius was standing by the dead, watching, with the deliberate purpose of fixing in his memory every detail, that he might have that picture in reserve, should any day of forgetfulness ever hereafter come to him with the temptation to feel completely happy again. A blind feeling of outrage, of resentment against nature itself, mingled with an agony of pity, as he noted on the now placid features a certain touching look of humility, almost of abjectness, like the expression of a smitten child or animal, as of one, fallen at last, after a bewildering struggle, wholly under the power of a remorseless adversary. Out of mere tenderness he would not forget one circumstance of all that ; as a man might piously stamp on his memory the death-scene of a brother wrongfully condemned, against a time that may come.

The fear of the corpse, which surprised him at last in his effort to watch by it at night, was a hint of his own failing strength, just in time. The first night after the washing of the body, he bore stoutly enough the tax which affection seemed to demand, throwing the incense from time to time on the little altar placed beside the bier. It was the recurrence of the thing—that unchanged outline below the coverlet, amid a silence in which the faintest rustle seemed to speak—that finally overcame his determination. Surely here, in this alienation, in this sense of distance between them, which had come over him before in a minor degree when the mind of Flavian had wandered in his sickness, was another of the pains of death. Yet he was able to make all due preparations, and go through the ceremonies, shortened a little because of the infection, when, on a cloudless evening, the funeral procession went forth ; himself, when the flames of the pyre had done their work, carrying away the urn of the deceased, in the folds of his toga, to its last resting-place in the cemetery beside the highway—and so turning home to sleep in his own lonely lodging.

Quis desiderio sit pudor aut modus Tam cari capitis?—

PART THE SECOND.

CHAPTER VIII.

ANIMULA, VAGULA, BLANDULA HOSPES COMESQUE CORPORIS, QUAE NUNC ABIBIS IN LOCA ?
PALLIDULA, RIGIDA, NUDULA.

The Emperor Hadrian to his Soul.

FLAVIAN was no more. The little marble chest with its dust and tears lay cold among the faded flowers. For most people the actual spectacle of death brings out into greater reality, at least for the imagination, whatever confidence they may entertain as to the soul's survival in another life. To Marius, greatly agitated by that event, the earthly end of Flavian came like a final revelation of nothing less than the soul's extinction. He had gone out as utterly as the fire among those still beloved ashes. Even such wistful suspense of judgment as that expressed by the dying Hadrian, regarding further stages of being still possible for his soul in some dim journey hence, seemed wholly untenable, and, with it, almost all that remained of the religion of his childhood. Future extinction seemed just then to be what the unforced witness of his own nature pointed to. On the other hand, there came a novel curiosity as to what the various schools of ancient philosophy had had to say concerning that strange, fluttering creature ; and that curiosity impelled him to certain severe studies, in which, as before, his earlier religious conscience seemed still to survive, as a principle of hieratic scrupulousness or integrity of thought, in this new service to intellectual light.

At this time, with his inward and poetic temper, he might have fallen a prey to the enervating mysticism which was then lying in wait for ardent souls, in many a melodramatic revival of old religion or theosophy. From all that, attractive as it might be to one side of his nature, he was kept by his real virility—by something well-braced, or cynical even—effective in him, among other results, as a hatred of theatricality, and an instinctive recognition that in vigorous intelligence must be indeed the most real presence of the divine being. With this was connected a feeling, all the stronger as manhood came on, of the poetic beauty of mere clearness of mind—the actually æsthetic charm of a cold austerity of thought ; as if the kinship of that to the clearness of physical light were something more than a figure of speech. Of all those various religious fantasies, as from enthusiasm, he could well appreciate the picturesque : that was made possible for him by a vein of Epicureanism, already leading him to conceive of himself as but the passive spectator of the world around him. But it was to the severer thought, of which such matters as Epicurean theory are born, that, in effect, he now betook himself. With an instinctive suspicion of those mechanical arcana, which really bring great and little souls to a level, for him, the only possible dilemma lay between the old, simple, ancestral Roman religion, now become so incredible to him, and the results of the honest action of his own unassisted, untroubled intelligence. Even those arcana cœlestia of the Platonists—all they had to say as to the essential indifference of pure soul to its bodily house and merely occasional dwelling-place—seemed to him, while his heart was there in the urn with the material ashes of Flavian, or still lingering in memory over his last agony, wholly unfeeling and inhuman, as tending to lessen his resentment at nature's wrong. It was to the sentiment of the body and the affections which it defined—the body, of whose color and force that wandering Platonic soul was but so frail a residue or abstract—that he clung. The various pathetic traits of the beloved, suffering, perished body of Flavian, so deeply pondered, had made him a materialist, and with something of the humor of a devotee.

It seemed at first as if his care for poetry had passed away with that, to be replaced by the literature of thought. His much pondered manuscript verses were laid aside; and what happened now to one, who was certainly to be somewhat of a poet from first to last, looked, at the moment, like a change from poetry to prose. He came of age at this time, and found himself, though with beardless face, his own master; and at eighteen, an age at which, then as now, many youths of capacity, who fancied themselves poets, secluded themselves from others chiefly in affectation and vague dreaming, he secluded himself indeed from others, but in a severe intellectual meditation, the salt of poetry, without which all the more serious charm is lacking to that imaginative world, which for him had revealed itself earlier in a spontaneous surrender to the dominion of outward impressions. Still with something of his old childish religious earnestness, he set himself—Sich im Denken zu orientiren—to determine his bearings, as by compass, in the world of thought—to get that precise acquaintance with the creative intelligence itself, its structure and capacities, its relation to other parts of himself and to other things, without which, certainly, no poetry can be masterly. Like a young man rich in this world's goods coming of age, he must go into affairs and ascertain his outlook: there must be no disguises: an exact estimate of realities, as towards himself, he must have—a delicately measured gradation of certainty in things—from the distant, haunted horizon of mere imagination or surmise, to the actual feeling of sorrow in his heart, as he reclined one morning, alone instead of in pleasant company, to ponder over the hard sayings of an imperfect old Greek manuscript, unrolled beside him. His former gay companions, meeting him in the streets of the old Italian town, and noting the graver lines coming into the face of the somber but enthusiastic student of intellectual structure, who could hold his own so well in the society of accomplished older men, were half afraid of him, though proud to have him of their company. Why thus reserved?—they asked, concerning the orderly, self-possessed youth, whose speech and carriage seemed so carefully measured, who was surely no poet like the rapt, disheveled Lupus. Was he secretly in love, perhaps, whose toga was so daintily folded, and who was always as fresh as the flowers he wore; or bent on his own line of ambition; or even on riches?

Marius, meantime, was reading freely, in early morning for the most part, those writers, chiefly, who had made it their business to know what might be thought concerning the strange, enigmatic, personal essence, which had certainly seemed to go out altogether, along with the funeral fires. And the old Greek who more than any other was now giving form to his thoughts was a very hard master. From Epicurus, from the thunder and lightning of Lucretius—like thunder and lightning some distance off, which one might recline to enjoy, in a garden of roses—he had gone back to the writer who was in a certain sense the teacher of both, Heraclitus of Ionia, whose difficult book “concerning Nature” was even then rare, for people had long since satisfied themselves by quoting certain brilliant isolated oracles only out of what was at best a taxing kind of lore. But the difficulty of the early Greek prose did but spur the curiosity of Marius: and the writer, the superior clearness of whose intellectual view had so isolated him from other men, and who had had so little joy of that superiority, was avowedly exacting as to the amount of devout attention he required from the student. “The many,” he said, always thus emphasizing the difference between the many and the few, are "like people heavy with wine," "led by children," "knowing not whither they go;" and yet, "much learning doth not make wise;" and again, "the ass, after all, would have its thistles rather than fine gold."

Heraclitus indeed had been aware of the difficulty for "the many" of the paradox with which his doctrine begins, and the due reception of which must involve a denial of habitual impressions, as the necessary first step in the way of truth. His philosophy had been developed in conscious, outspoken opposition to the current mode of thinking, as a matter requiring an exceptional loyalty to pure reason and its "dry light." Men are subject to an illusion, he protests, regarding matters apparent to sense: what the uncorrected sense gives being a false impression of permanence or fixity in things, which have really changed their nature in the very moment in which we see and touch them. And the radical flaw in the current mode of thought would lie in this—that, reflecting this false or unpurged sensation, it attributes to the phenomena of experience a durability which does not really belong to them. Imaging forth from those fleeting impressions a world of firmly outlined objects, it leads one to regard as a thing stark and dead what in reality is full of animation, of energy, of the fire of life—that eternal process of nature, of which at a later time Goethe spoke, as the "Living Garment." through which God is seen by us, ever in weaving at the "Loom of Time."

And the appeal which the old Greek thinker made was, in the first instance, from confused to unconfused sensation ; with a sort of prophetic seriousness, a great claim and assumption, which we may understand, if we anticipate in this preliminary skepticism the ulterior scope of his speculation, according to which the universal motion of all natural things is but one particular stage, of measure, in that unresisting energy in which the divine reason consists. The one true being—the constant subject of all early thought—it was his merit to have conceived, not as a stagnant and sterile inaction, but as a perpetual energy, from the restless stream of which, at certain points, some elements detach themselves and harden into non-entity and death, corresponding, as outward objects, to man's inward condition of ignorance ; that is, to the slowness of his faculties. It is with this paradox of a subtle, perpetual change in all visible things, that the high speculation of Heraclitus begins. Hence that scorn he expresses for anything like a careless, half-conscious, “ use-and-wont ” reception of our experience, which took so strong a hold on men's memories ! Hence those many precepts towards a strenuous self-consciousness in all we think and do, that loyalty to cool and candid reason, which makes strict attentiveness of mind a kind of religious duty and service.

The merely skeptical doctrine, then, that the seemingly fixed objects of our ordinary experience are really in perpetual change, had been, as originally conceived, but the preliminary step toward a great system of almost religious philosophy. Then as now, the philosophic and illuminated mind might apprehend, in what seemed a mass of lifeless matter, the movement of the universal life, in which things, and men's impressions of them, were ever "coming to be," alternately consumed and renewed. That perpetual change, which an attentive understanding could discover where common opinion found fixed objects, was but the sign of a subtler but more universal motion—the sustained, unsleeping, forward-pushing vitality—of the divine reason itself, ever proceeding by its own rhythmical logic, and lending to all mind and matter, in turn, what life they had. In this "perpetual flux" of minds and things, there was, as Heraclitus conceived, a continuance, if not of their material or spiritual elements, yet of orderly intelligible relationships, like the harmony of musical notes, wrought out in and through the series of their mutations—ordinances of the divine reason, maintained throughout the changes of the phenomenal world: and this harmony in their mutation and opposition, was a principle of sanity and reality in things. But it had happened, that, of all this, the first, merely skeptical step, that easiest step on the threshold, had alone remained in general memory; and the "doctrine of motion" seemed to those who had felt its seduction to make all fixed knowledge impossible. The swift passage of things, the still swifter passage of those modes of our conscious being which seemed to reflect them, might indeed be the burning of the divine fire; but what was ascertained was that they did pass away like a devouring flame, or like the race of water in the mid-stream ; too swiftly for any real knowledge of them to be attainable. Heracliteanism had grown to be almost identical with the famous doctrine of the sophist Protagoras, that the momentary, sensible apprehension of the individual was the only standard of what is or is not, and each one the measure of all things to himself. The impressive name of Heraclitus had become but an authority for a philosophy of the despair of knowledge.

And as it had been with his earlier followers in Greece, so it happened now with his later Roman disciple. He, too, halted at the apprehension of that swift, energetic motion in things—the drift of flowers, of little or great souls, of ambitious systems—in the stream around him ; the distant higher reaches of which, in possible regions out of sight, counted with him but as a dim problem. The bold, pantheistic flight of the old Greek master from the fleeting object to that one universal life, in which the whole sphere of physical change might be reckoned but as a single pulsation, remained by him but as a hypothesis only—the hypothesis he actually preferred, as in itself most credible, however scantily realizable even by the imagination—yet still but as one unverified hypothesis concerning the first principle of things, among many others. He might reserve it as a fine, high, visionary consideration, very remote upon the intellectual ladder, just at the point, indeed, where that ladder seemed to pass into the clouds, but for which there was certainly no time left just now by his eager interest in the real things so close to him, on the lowlier earthy steps nearest the ground. And those early days of reverie when he played at priests, played in many another day-dream, working away from the actual present as much as he might, with a delightful sense of escape as he replaced the outer world of other people by an inward world of his own as he himself really cared to have it, had made him a kind of natural "idealist." He had become aware of the possibility of a large dissidence between an inward and somewhat exclusive world of his own vivid apprehensions, and the unimproved, unheightened reality of the world of those about him; and was ready now to concede, somewhat more easily than others, the first point of his new lesson, that the individual is to himself the measure of all things, and to rely on the exclusive certainty to himself of his own impressions. To move afterwards in that outer world of other people, as if taking it at its own estimate, would be possible only as a kind of irony. And as with the Vicaire Savoyard, after reflecting on the variations of philosophy, "the first fruit he drew from that reflection was the lesson of a limitation of his researches to what immediately interested him; to rest peacefully in a profound ignorance as to all besides; to disquiet himself only concerning those things which it was of import for him to know." And at least he would entertain no theory of conduct which did not allow its due weight to that primary element of incertitude or negation, in the conditions of man's life,

And just here he joined company, retracing in his intellectual pilgrimage the actual historic order of old philosophy, with another wayfarer on the journey, another ancient Greek master, the founder of the Cyrenaic philosophy, whose impressive, traditional utterances (for he had left no writing) served, in turn, to give effective outline to his thoughts. There was something in the doctrine itself congruous with the place in which it had sprung up; and for a time Marius lived much, in thought, in the brilliant Greek colony which had given a dubious name to the philosophy of pleasure. It hung, for his fancy, between the mountains and the sea, among richer than Italian gardens, on a certain breezy table-land projecting from the African coast, two hundred miles south of Greece. There, in a delightful climate, with something of transalpine temperance amid its luxury, and withal in an inward atmosphere of temperance, which did but further enhance the brilliancy of life, the school of Cyrene had maintained itself as almost one with the family of its founder; certainly as nothing coarse or unclean; and under the influence of accomplished women.

Aristippus of Cyrene too had left off in suspense of judgment as to what might really lie behind—flammanitia mœnia mundi—the flaming rampart of the world. Those strange, bold, skeptical surmises, which had haunted the minds of the old Ionian physicists as merely abstract doubt, which had been present to the mind of Heraclitus, as we saw, as one element only in a constructive system of philosophy, became with Aristippus a very subtly practical worldly-wisdom. The difference between him and those obscure earlier thinkers is almost like that between an ancient thinker generally, and a modern man of the world; it was the difference between the mystic in his cell, or the prophet in his retreat, and the expert, cosmopolitan, administrator of his dark sayings, translating the abstract thoughts of the master into terms, first of all, of sentiment. It has been sometimes seen, in the history of thought, that when thus translated into terms of sentiment—of sentiment, as lying already half-way towards practice—the abstract ideas of metaphysics for the first time reveal their true significance. The metaphysical principle, in itself, as it were, without hands and feet, becomes effective, impressive, fascinating, when translated into a precept as to how it were best to feel and act; in other words, under its sentimental or ethical equivalent. The leading idea of the master of Cyrene, the theory that things are but shadows and that we, like them, never continue in one stay, might indeed have made itself effective as a languid, enervating, consumptive nihilism—as a precept of “renunciation,” which would touch and handle, and busy itself about nothing. But in the reception of metaphysical formulae, all depends, as regards their ulterior and actual effect, on the pre-existent qualities of that soil of human nature on which they fall—on the company they find already present there, on their admission into the house of thought; there being at least so much truth as this involves in the theological maxim, that the reception of this or that speculative conclusion is really a matter of will. The persuasion that all is vanity, with that happily constituted Greek, who had been a genuine disciple of Socrates and reflected, presumably, something of his blitheness in the face of the world, his happy way of taking all chances, generated neither frivolity nor sourness; but induced, rather, an impression, just serious enough, of the call upon men's attention of the crisis in which they find themselves; it became a stimulus towards every kind of activity, and prompted a perpetual, inextinguishable thirst after experience.

With Marius, then, the influence of the philosopher of pleasure depended on this, that in him a doctrine, originally somewhat acrid, had fallen upon a rich and genial nature, capable of transforming it into a theory of practice which seemed to many to have no inconsiderable stimulative power towards a fair life. What Marius saw in him was the spectacle of one of the happiest temperaments coming, as it were, to an understanding with the most depressing of theories; accepting the results of a metaphysical system to nearly every one so sterile, a system which seemed to concentrate into itself all the weakening trains of thought in earlier Greek speculation, and making the best of it; turning its hard, bare truths, with a wonderful tact, into precepts of a most delicately honorable life. Given the hardest terms, supposing our days are indeed but a shadow, even so, we may well adorn and beautify, in a scrupulous self-respect, our souls, and whatever our souls touch upon—these wonderful bodies, these material dwelling-places through which the shadows pass together for awhile, the very raiment we wear, our pastimes as we say, and the intercourse of society. The best judges saw in him something like the graceful “humanities” of the later Roman, and our own modern culture, as it is termed; and Horace recalled his sayings to express best his own perfect amenity of manner in the reception of life.

In this way, for Marius, under the guidance of that old master of decorous living, those doubts as to the criteria of truth reduced themselves to a very clear and almost drily practical skepticism, a skepticism which developed the opposition between things as they are and our impressions and thoughts about them—the possibility, if an outward world does really exist, of some faultiness in our apprehension of it—the doctrine, in short, of what is termed “the subjectivity of knowledge.” It is a consideration, indeed, which lies as an element of weakness, like some admitted fault or flaw at the very foundation of every philosophical account of the universe; which confronts all philosophies at their starting, but with which none have really dealt conclusively, some perhaps not quite sincerely; which those who are not philosophers dissipate by common, but unphilosophical sense, or by religious faith. It was the peculiar strength of Marius to have apprehended this weakness at the very foundations of human Knowledge, in the whole range of its consequences. Our knowledge is limited to what we feel, he reflected; we need no proof that we feel. But can we be sure that things are at all like our feelings? Mere peculiarities in the instruments of our cognition like the little waves and knots in a mirror, may distort the matter which they seem but to represent. Of other people we cannot really know even the feelings, nor how far they would indicate the same modifications, each one of a personality really unique, in using the same terms as ourselves; that "common experience," which is sometimes proposed as a satisfactory basis of certainty, being after all only a fixity of language. But our own impressions!—The brightness and heat of the blue veil over our heads, if it be indeed a veil over anything!—How reassuring, after assisting at so long a debate about rival criteria of truth, to fall back upon direct sensation, to limit one's aspiration after knowledge to that! In an age, still materially so brilliant, so expert in the artistic handling of material things, with sensible capacities still unjaded, with the whole world of classic art and poetry outspread before it, and where there was more than eye or ear could well take in—how natural the determination to rely exclusively upon the phenomena of the senses, which certainly never deceive us about themselves, about which alone we can never deceive ourselves!

So, the merely abstract, skeptical apprehension that the little point of the present moment alone really is, between a past which has just ceased to be and the future which may never come, became practical with Marius, as the resolution, as far as possible, to exclude regret and desire, and yield himself to the improvement of the present with an absolutely disengaged mind. America is here and now—here or nowhere—as Wilhelm Meister finds out one day, just not too late, after so long looking vaguely across the ocean for the opportunity of the development of his capacities. It was as if, recognizing perpetual motion as the law of nature, Marius identified his own way of life cordially with it, “throwing himself into the stream,” as we say: he too must maintain a harmony with that soul of motion in things, by a constantly renewed mobility of character.

Omnis Aristippum decuit color et status et res—

so Horace had summed up that perfect manner in the reception of life, attained by his old Cyrenaic master; and the first practical consequence of the metaphysic which lay behind that perfect manner, had been the limitation, almost the renunciation, of metaphysical inquiry itself. Metaphysic—that art, as it has so often proved, in the words of Michelet, de s'égarer avec méthode, of bewildering oneself methodically—one must spend little time upon that! In the school of Cyrene, great as was its mental incisiveness, logical and physical speculations, theoretical interests generally, had been valued only so far as they served to give a groundwork, an intellectual justification, to that exclusive limitation to practical ethics which was a note of the Cyrenaic philosophy. How earnest and enthusiastic, how true to itself, under how many varieties of character, had been the effort of the Greeks after "theory"—theôria—that vision of a wholly reasonable world, which, according to the greatest of them, literally makes man like God; how loyally they had still persisted in the quest after that, in spite of how many disappointments! In the Gospel of Saint John, perhaps, some of them might have found the sort of vision they were really seeking for; but not in "doubtful disputations" concerning "being" and "not-being," knowledge and appearance. Men's minds (even young men's minds) at that late day, might well seem oppressed by the ennui of systems which had so far outrun positive knowledge; and in the mind of Marius, as in that old school of Cyrene, this ennui, combined, as it was, with appetites so vigorous and youthful, brought about a reaction, in which, by a sort of suicidal dialectic (examples of which have been seen since) a great metaphysical acuteness was devoted to the function of proving metaphysical speculation impossible, or useless. Abstract theory was to be valued only so far as it might serve to clear the tablet of the mind from suppositions only half realizable, or wholly visionary, and leave it, in flawless evenness, to the impressions of a direct and concrete experience.

To be absolutely virgin towards a direct and concrete experience, to rid ourselves of those abstractions which are but the ghosts of by-gone impressions--of the notions we have made for ourselves, and which so often do but misrepresent the experience they profess to represent--idola, idols, or false appearances, as Bacon calls them later--to neutralize the distorting influence of metaphysical theory by an all-accomplished theoretic skill--it is this hard, bold, sober recognition, under a very "dry light," of its own proper aims, in union with a habit of feeling which on the practical side may leave a broad opening to human weakness, that gives to the Cyrenaic doctrine, to reproductions of that doctrine in the time of Marius or in our own, their gravity and importance. To that school the young man would come, eager for truth, expecting much from philosophy, in no ignoble curiosity, aspiring after nothing less than an "initiation." He would be sent back, sooner or later, to experience, to the world of concrete impressions, to things as they may be seen, heard, felt by him; but with a wonderful machinery of observation and free from the tyranny of mere theories.

So, in intervals of repose, after the agitation which followed the death of Flavian, the thoughts of Marius ran on, as he felt himself, as it were, back again in the fine, clear, peaceful light of that pleasant school of healthfully sensuous wisdom, in the brilliant old Greek colony, on its fresh upland by the sea. Not pleasure, but fulness, completeness of life generally was the practical ideal to which this anti-metaphysical metaphysic really pointed. And towards such a full or complete life, a life of various yet select sensation, the most direct and effective auxiliary must be, in a word, Insight. Liberty of soul, freedom from all the partial and misrepresentative doctrine which does but relieve one element in our experience at the cost of another, freedom from all the embarrassment of regret for the past and calculation on the future; all that would be but preliminary to the real business of education—insight, insight through culture, into all that the present moment holds in trust for us, as we stand so briefly in its presence. From that theory of Life as the end of life, followed, as a practical consequence, the desirableness of refining all the instruments of inward and outward intuition, of developing all their capacities, of testing and exercising oneself in them, till one's whole nature should become a complex medium of reception, towards the vision—the beatific vision, if one really cared to make it such—of our actual experience in the world. Not the conveyance of an abstract body of truths or principles, would be the aim of the right education of oneself, or of another, but the conveyance of an art—an art in some degree peculiar and special to each individual; with the modifications, that is, due to his peculiar constitution, and the circumstances of his growth, inasmuch as no one of us is “like another all in all.”

CHAPTER IX.

NEW CYRENAICISM.

SUCH were the practical conclusions drawn for himself by Marius, when somewhat later he had outgrown the mastery of others, from the principle that "all is vanity." If he could but count upon the present, if a life brief at best could not certainly be shown to lead to anything beyond itself, if men's highest curiosity was indeed so persistently baffled—then, with the Cyrenaics of all ages, he would at least fill up the measure of that present with vivid sensations, and those intellectual apprehensions, which, in strength and directness and their immediately realized values at the bar of actual experience, are most like sensations. So some have spoken in every age of thought; for, like all theories which really express a strong natural tendency of the human mind or even one of its characteristic modes of weakness, this vein of reflection is a constant tradition in philosophy. Every age of European thought has had its Cyrenaics or Epicureans, under many disguises; even under the hood of the monk. But—Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die!—is a principle, the real import of which differs immensely according to the natural taste and the acquired judgment, of the guests who sit at the table. It may express nothing better than the instinct of Dante's Ciaccio, the accomplished glutton, in the mud of the Inferno; or, since on no hypothesis does man "live by bread alone," it may come to be identical with—"My meat is to do what is just and kind;" while the soul, which cannot pretend to the apprehension of anything beyond the veil of immediate experience, yet never loses a feeling of happiness in conforming to the highest moral ideal it can sincerely define for itself; and actually, though but with so faint hope; does the "Father's business."

In that age of Marcus Aurelius, so completely disabused of the metaphysical ambition to pass beyond "the flaming rampart of the world," but on the other hand, possessed of so vast an accumulation of intellectual products, with so wide a view before it over all varieties of what is powerful or attractive in man and his works, the thoughts of Marius did but follow the line taken by the majority of educated persons, though to a very different issue. Pitched to a really high and serious key, the precept—Be perfect in regard to what is here and now—the precept of "culture" as it is called—that is, of a complete education—might at least save him from the heaviness and vulgarity of a generation, certainly of no general fineness of temper, but with much material well-being. Conceded that what is secure in our existence is but the sharp apex of the present moment between two hypothetical eternities, and all that is real in our experience but a series of fleeting impressions—so he continued the skeptical argument he had condensed, as the matter to hold by, from his various philosophical reading—given, that we are never to get beyond the walls of this closely shut cell of our own subjective personality ; if the ideas we are somehow impelled to form of an outer world, and even of other minds akin to our own, are, it may be, but a day-dream, and the thought of a world beyond, a day-dream probably thinner still : then, he, at least, in whom those fleeting impressions—faces, voices, material sunshine—were very real and imperious, might well set himself to the consideration, how such actual moments as they passed might be made to yield him their utmost, by the most dexterous training of his capacities. Amid abstract metaphysical doubts, as to what might lie one step only beyond that experience, reinforcing the deep original materialism or earthliness of human nature itself, bound so intimately to the visible world, let him at least make the most of what was “here and now.” In the actual dimness of ways from means to ends—ends though in themselves excellent, yet for the most part distant, and for him, certainly, below the visible horizon—he would at all events be sure that the means, to use the well-worn phraseology, should have something of finality or perfection about them, and themselves partake, in a measure, of that more excellent nature of ends—that the means should justify the end.

With this view he would demand culture, as the Cyrenaics said, or, in other words, a wide and various education—an education partly negative, as defining the true limits of man's capacity, but, for the most part positive, and directed especially to the enlarging and refinement of the receptive powers; of those powers, above all, which are directly relative to fleeting phenomena—the powers of sensation and emotion. In such an education, an “æsthetic” education, as it might now be termed, and certainly occupied very largely with those aspects of things which affect us pleurably through the senses, art, of course, including all the finer sorts of literature, would have a great part to play. The study of music, in the wider Platonic sense, according to which, Music comprehends all those things over which the Muses of Greek mythology preside, would conduct one to an exquisite appreciation of all the finer traits of nature and of man. Nay!—the products of the imagination must themselves be held to present the most perfect forms of life—spirit and matter, alike, under their purest and most perfect conditions—the most strictly appropriate object of that impassioned contemplation, which, in the world of intellectual discipline, as in the highest forms of morality and religion, must be held to be the essential function of the “perfect.” Such a manner of life might itself even come to seem a kind of religion—an inward, visionary, mystic piety or religion—by virtue of its effort to live days “lovely and pleasant” in themselves, here and now, and with an all-sufficiency of well-being in the immediate sense of the object contemplated, independently of any faith, or hope that might be entertained, as to their ultimate tendency. In this way, the true "æsthetic culture" would be realizable as a new form of the "contemplative life," founding its claim on the essential "blessedness" of "vision"—the vision of perfect men and things. One's human nature, indeed, would fain reckon on an assured, unending future—on the vision of a final home, to be attained at some still distant date, it may be, yet with a conscious, delightful home-coming at last, as depicted in many an old poetic Elysium. But then, on the other hand, the world of perfected sensation, emotion, intelligence, is so close to us, and so attractive, that the most visionary can but paint that other distant home in colors really borrowed from it. Let me be sure then—might he not plausibly say?—that I miss no circumstance of this world of realized consciousness in the present! Here, at least, is a vision, a theory—theoria—which reposes upon no basis of unverified hypothesis, and makes no call upon a future really problematic; as it would be unaffected by any discovery of an Empedocles (improving upon Hesiod, or the old story of Prometheus) as to what had been really the origin, and course of development, of man's actually attained faculties, and that seemingly divine particle of reason or spirit, in him. Such a theory, at more leisurable moments, would, of course, have its precepts to propound, on the embellishment, generally, of what is near at hand, on the adornment of life; till, in a not impracticable rule of conduct, one's existence, from day to day, would come to be like a well-executed piece of music ; that “ perpetual motion ” in things (so Marius figured the matter to himself, under the old Greek imageries) according itself to a kind of cadence or harmony.

It was intelligible that this “ æsthetic ” philosophy might find itself (theoretically, at least, and as by way of a curious question in casuistry, legitimate from its own point of view) weighing the claims of that eager, concentrated, impassioned realization of experience, against the claims of the received morality. Conceiving its own function in a somewhat desperate temper, and becoming, as every high-strung form of sentiment, as even the religious sentiment itself, may become, somewhat antinomian, when, in its effort towards the order of experiences it prefers, it is confronted with the traditional and popular morality, at points where that morality may look very like a convention, or a mere stage-property of the world, it would be found, from time to time, breaking beyond the limits of the actual moral order ; perhaps, not without some pleasurable excitement in so bold a venture.

With the possibility of some such hazard as that, in thought or even in practice—that it might be, though refining, and even bracing, for those strong and in health, yet, as Pascal says of the kindly and temperate wisdom of Montaigne, “ pernicious for those who have any natural tendency to impiety or vice,” the line of reflection traced out above, was fairly chargeable ; not, however, with being, as a necessary consequence, “ hedonistic.” Marius was still pure and strong. He knew that his carefully considered theory of practice braced him, with the effect of a moral principle duly recurring to mind every morning, towards the work of a student, for which he might seem intended. Yet there were some among his acquaintance who jumped to the conclusion that, with the "Epicurean stye," he was making pleasure—pleasure, as they so poorly conceived it—the sole motive of life; and precluded any exacter estimate of the situation by covering it with a high-sounding general term, through the vagueness of which they were enabled to see the severe and laborious youth in the vulgar company of Lais. Words like "hedonism"—terms of large and vague comprehension—especially when used with an avowedly controversial purpose, have ever been the worst examples of what are called "question-begging terms;" and in that late age in which Marius lived, amid the dust of so many centuries of philosophical debate, the air was full of them. Yet those who used that reproachful Greek term for the philosophy of pleasure, were hardly more likely than the old Greeks themselves, (on whom regarding this very subject of the theory of pleasure, their masters in the art of correct thinking had so emphatically to impress the necessity of "making distinctions,") to come to any very delicately correct ethical conclusions by a reasoning, which began with a general term, comprehensive enough to cover pleasures so different in quality, in their causes and effects, as the pleasures of wine and love, of art and science, of religious enthusiasm and political enterprise, and of that taste or curiosity, which satisfied itself with long days of serious study. Yet, in truth, each of those pleasurable modes of activity may, in its turn, fairly become the ideal of the "hedonistic" doctrine. Really, to the phase of reflection through which Marius was then passing, the charge of "hedonism," whatever its real weight might be, was not properly applicable at all. Not pleasure, but fulness of life, and "insight" as conducting to that fulness—energy, choice, and variety of experience—including noble pain and sorrow even,—loves such as those in the exquisite old story of Apuleius; such sincere and strenuous forms of the moral life, as Seneca and Epictetus—whatever form of human life, in short, was impassioned and ideal; it was from these that the "new Cyrenaicism" of Marius took its criterion of values. It was a theory, indeed, which might rightly be regarded as in a great degree coincident with the main principle of the Stoics themselves, and a version of the precept "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might"—a doctrine so widely acceptable among the nobler spirits of that time: and as with that, its mistaken tendency would lie in the direction of a kind of idolatry of mere life, or natural gift, or strength—l'idolatrie des talents.

To understand the various forms of ancient art and thought, the various forms of actual human feeling (the only new thing, in a world almost too rich in what was old) to satisfy, with a kind of scrupulous equity, the claims of these concrete and actual objects on his sympathy, his intelligence, his senses—to “pluck out the heart of their mystery,” and in turn become the interpreter of them to others;—that had now defined itself as a very narrowly practical motive with Marius, it determined his choice of a vocation to live by. It was the age of the rhetoricians, or sophists, as they were sometimes called; of men who came in some instances to great fame and fortune, by way of a literary cultivation of “science.” That science, it has been often said, must have been wholly an affair of words. But in a world, confessedly so rich in what was ancient, the work, even of genius, must necessarily consist very much in criticism: and, in the case of the more excellent specimens of his class, the rhetorician was, after all, the eloquent and effective interpreter, for the delighted ears of others, of what understanding himself had come by, in years of travel and study, of the beautiful house of art and thought of which that age was the inheritor. The emperor Marcus Aurelius, to whose service Marius had now been called, was himself, more or less openly, a lecturer. That late world, amid many curiously vivid modern traits, had this spectacle of the public lecturer or essayist; in some cases adding to his other gifts that of the Christian preacher who knows how to touch people’s sensibilities on behalf of the suffering. To follow in the way of these successes, was the natural instinct of youthful ambition: and it was with no vulgar egotism, that Marius, at the age of twenty years, determined to enter, like many another young man of parts, as a student of rhetoric, at Rome.

Though he had changed, formally, from poetry to prose, he was still, and must always be, of the poetic temper: by which, I mean, among other things, that, quite independently of the general habit of that pensive age, he lived much, and as it were by system, in memory. Amid all that eager grasping at the sensation, the consciousness, of the present, he had come to see that, after all, the main point of economy in the conduct of that present, was the question—How will it look to me, at what shall I value it, this day next year?—that, in a given day or month, one's main concern was its impression for the memory. A strange trick his memory would play him sometimes; for, as if without natural gradation, things of last month, or of yesterday, would seem as far off, as detached from him, as things of ten years ago. Detached from him, yet very real—certain spaces of his life lay in delicate perspective, under a favorable light; and, somehow, all less choice detail and circumstance had parted from them. Such hours were oftenest those in which he had been helped by the work of others to the pleasurable apprehension of art, or nature, or life. "Not what I do, but what I am, under the power of this vision"—he would say to himself—"is what were indeed pleasing to the gods."

And yet, with a kind of inconsistency in one who had taken for his philosophic ideal the μονόχρονος ἡδονή of Aristippus—the pleasure of the ideal present, the mystic now—there would come, together with that precipitate sinking of things into the past, a desire to retain “what was so transitive.” Could he but arrest for others also, certain clauses of experience, as that imaginative memory presented them to himself! In those grand, hot summers, he would have imprisoned the very perfume of the flowers. To create—to live, perhaps, a little beyond the allotted span, in some fragment even, of perfect expression—was the form his longing took, for something to hold by and rest on, amid the perpetual flux. With men of his chosen vocation, people were apt to say, words were things. Well! with him, words should be indeed things—the word, the phrase, valuable in exact proportion to the transparency with which it conveyed to others the apprehension, the emotion, the mood, so vividly real within himself. Verba provisam rem non invita sequentur—Virile apprehension of the true nature of things, of the true nature of one’s own impression, first of all—words would follow that, naturally; a right understanding of oneself being the first precept of genuine style. Language, delicate and measured—the delicate Attic phrase, for instance, in which the eminent Aristides could speak—was then a power to which people’s hearts, and sometimes even their purses, readily responded. And there were many points, as Marius thought, on which the heart of that age greatly needed to be touched. He hardly knew how strong that old religious sense of responsibility, the conscience as we call it, still was within him—a body of inward impressions, as real as those so highly valued outward ones—concerning other people's feelings or impressions, among other matters; to offend against which, brought with it, in his case, a strange sensation of disloyalty, as to a person. And the determination, adhered to with no misgiving, as being somehow a part of himself, to add nothing, not so much as a passing sigh even, to the great total of men's unhappiness, in his way through the world:—that too was something to hold by, in the drift of mere "appearances."

And all this would involve a life of industry, of industrious study, only possible through healthy rule, keeping the eye of body and spirit clear. It was the male element, the remorselessly logical consciousness, asserting itself, with opening manhood—asserting itself, even in his literary style, by a certain firmness of outline, that touch of the worker in metal, amid its richness. Already he blamed instinctively alike in his work and in himself, as youth so rarely does, all that had not passed a long and liberal process of erasure. The happy phrase or sentence was really modeled upon a cleanly finished structure of scrupulous thought. The suggestive force of the one master of his development, who had battled so hard with imaginative prose: the utterance, the golden utterance, of the other master, so content with its living power of persuasion that he had never written at all,—in the commixture of those two qualities, he set up his literary ideal: and its rare blending of grace with an intellectual hardness or astringency, was the secret of a singular expressiveness in it,

He acquired at this time a certain bookishness, the somewhat somber habitude of the avowed scholar which, though it never interfered with the perfect tone, "fresh and serenely disposed," of the Roman gentleman, yet qualified it as by an interesting oblique trait, and frightened away some of his equals in age and rank. The sober discretion of his thoughts, his sustained habit of meditation, the sense of those negative conclusions enabling him to concentrate himself with an absorption so entire upon what is immediately here and now, while he lived so intently in the world, yet with an air so disengaged, gave him a peculiar expression of intellectual confidence, as of one who had indeed been initiated into a great secret. And now, in the reaction against that preoccupation with other persons, which had so often perturbed his spirit, his wistful speculation as to what the real, the greater experience might be, determined itself in him, not as the longing for love—to be with Aspasia, or Cynthia—but as a thirst for existence in exquisite places. The veil, which was to be lifted up for him, lay over the works of old mastery in art, in places where nature also had used her mastery. And it was just then that the summons to Rome came.

CHAPTER X.

MIRUM EST UT ANIMUS AGITATIONE MOTUQUE
CORPORIS EXCITETUR.

Pliny's Letters.

MANY points in that train of thought, its harder and more energetic practical details especially, at first surmised but vaguely in the intervals of his visits to the tomb of Flavian, gained the consistency of formal principle amid the stirring incidents of the journey, which took him, still in all the buoyancy of his nineteen years and greatly expectant, to Rome. That summons had come from one of the former friends of his father in the capital, who had been able, though unsuspected, to keep himself acquainted with the lad's progress, and who, assured of his parts, his courtly ways, and above all of his beautiful penmanship, now offered him a place, virtually that of an amanuensis, near the person of the philosophic emperor. The old town-house of his family on the Cælian, so long neglected, might well require his personal care; and Marius, relieved a little by his preparations for traveling from that over-tension of spirit, in which he had lived of late, was soon afterwards, on his way, to await introduction to Aurelius, on his expected return to Rome, after a first success, illusivè enough as it was soon to appear, against the invaders from beyond the Danube.

The opening stage of his journey, through the firm golden weather, for which he had lingered three days beyond the appointed time of starting—days brown with the first rains of autumn—brought him, by the by-ways among the lower slopes of the Apennines of Luna, to the town of Luca, a station on the Cassian Way; traveling so far, mainly on foot, the baggage following under the care of his attendants. He wore a broad felt hat, in fashion not very unlike a more modern pilgrim's, the neat head projecting from the collar of his gray penula or traveling mantle, sewed closely together over the breast, but with the two sides folded back over the shoulders; to leave the arms free in walking; and was altogether so trim and fresh, that, as he climbed the hill from Pisa, by the long steep lane through the olive-yards, and turned to gaze where he could just discern the cypresses of the old school garden, like two black lines upon the yellow walls, a little child took possession of his hand, and, looking up at him with entire confidence, paced on bravely at his side, for the mere pleasure of his company, to the spot where the road sank again into the valley beyond. From this point, leaving his servants at a distance, he surrendered himself, a willing subject, as he walked, to the impressions of the road, and was almost surprised, both at the suddenness with which evening came on, and the distance from his old home at which it found him.

And at the little town of Luca, he felt that indescribable sense of a welcoming in the mere outward appearance of things, which seems to mark out certain places for the special purpose of evening rest, and gives them always a peculiar amiability in retrospect. Under the deepening twilight, the rough-tiled roofs seem to huddle together side by side, like one continuous shelter over the whole township, spread low and broad over the snug sleeping-rooms within ; and the place one sees for the first time, and must tarry in but for a night, breathes the very spirit of home. The cottagers lingered at their doors for a few minutes as the shadows grew larger, and went to rest early ; though there was still a glow along the road through the shorn cornfields, and the birds were still awake about the crumbling gray heights of an old temple ; and yet so quiet and air-swept was the place, you could hardly tell where the country left off in it, and the field-paths became its streets. Next morning he must needs change the manner of his journey. The light baggage-wagon returned, and he proceeded now more quickly, traveling a stage or two by post, along the Cassian Way, where the figures and incidents of the great high-road seemed already to tell of the capital, the one center to which all were hastening, or had lately bidden adieu. That Way lay through the heart of the old, mysterious and visionary country of Etruria ; and what he knew of its strange religion of the dead, reinforced by the actual sight of its funeral houses scattered so plentifully among the dwellings of the living, revived in him for a while in all its strength, his old instinctive yearning towards those inhabitants of the shadowy land he had known in life. It seemed to him that he could half divine how time passed in those painted houses on the hill-sides, among the gold and silver ornaments, the wrought armor and vestments, the drowsy and dead attendants: and the close consciousness of that vast population gave him no fear, but rather a sense of companionship, as he climbed the hill on foot behind the horses, through the genial afternoon.

The road, next day, passed below a town as primitive it might seem as the rocks it perched on—white rocks which had been long glistening before him in the distance. Down the dewy paths the people were descending from it, to keep a holiday, high and low alike in rough, white linen smocks. A homely old play was just begun in an open-air theater, the grass-grown seats of which had been hollowed out in the turf; and Marius caught the terrified expression of a child in its mother's arms as it turned from the yawning mouth of a great mask, for refuge in her bosom. The way mounted, and descended again, down the steep street of another place—all resounding with the noise of metal under the hammer; for every house had its brazier's workshop, the bright objects of brass and copper gleaming, like lights in a cave, out of their dark roofs and corners. Around the anvils the children were watching the work, or ran to fetch water to the hissing, red-hot metal; and Marius too watched, as he took his hasty mid-day refreshment, a mess of chestnut meal and cheese, while the curved surfaces of a great copper water-vessel became flowered all over with tiny petals under the skilful strokes. Towards dusk, a frantic woman at the roadside stood and cried out the words of some philter, or malison, in verse, with a weird motion of her hands, as the travelers passed, like a wild picture drawn from Virgil.

But all along, accompanying the superficial grace of these incidents of the way, Marius noted, more and more as he drew nearer to Rome, the records of the great plague. Under Hadrian and his successors, there had been many enactments to improve the condition of the slaves. The ergastula had been abolished. But no system of free labor had as yet succeeded: and a whole mendicant population, artfully exaggerating every circumstance and symptom of misery, still hung around, or sheltered themselves within the vast walls of their old, half-ruined task-houses. And for the most part they had been variously stricken by the pestilence. For once, the heroic level had been reached in rags, squints, scars—every caricature of the human type—ravaged beyond what could have been thought possible if it were to survive at all. Meantime, the farms were less carefully tended than of old: here and there they were lapsing into their natural wildness: and some villas also had partly fallen into ruin. The picturesque, romantic Italy of a later time—the Italy of Claude and Salvator Rosa—was already forming, for the delight of the modern romantic traveler.

And again Marius was aware of a real change in things, on crossing the Tiber, as if some magic effect lay in that ; though here, in truth, the Tiber was but a modest enough stream of turbid water. Nature, under the richer sky, seemed readier and more affluent, and man fitter to his circumstances : even in people hard at work there seemed to be a less burdensome sense of the mere business of life. How dreamily the women were passing up through the broad lights and shadows of the steep streets, with their great water-pots resting on their heads, like women of Caryæ, set free from their slavery in old Greek temples. With what a fresh and primitive poetry was daily life here impressed—all the details of the threshing-floor and the vineyard—the common farm-life, even—the great bakers' fires gleaming out on the road in the evening. In the presence of all that, Marius was for a moment like those old, early, unconscious poets, who made the famous Greek myths of Dionysus, and the Great Mother, out of the imagery of the wine-press and the plow-share. And still the motion of the journey was bringing his thoughts to systematic form. He seemed to have grown to the fulness of intellectual manhood, on his way hither. The formative, and literary stimulus (so to call it) of peaceful exercise, which he had always observed in himself, doing its utmost now, form and matter of thought alike detached themselves clearly and readily from the healthfully excited brain. "It is wonderful," says Pliny, "how the mind is stirred to activity by brisk bodily exercise." The presentable aspects of inmost thought and feeling became clear to him; the structure of all he meant, its order and outline, defined itself; his general sense of fitness and beauty in words became effective in daintily pliant sentences, with all sorts of felicitous linking of figure and abstraction. It seemed just then as if the desire of the artist in him—that old longing to produce—might be satisfied by the exact and just expression merely of what was then passing around him, in simple prose, arresting the desirable moment as it passed, and prolonging its life a little. To live in the concrete! To be sure, at least, of one's hold upon that!—Again, his philosophic scheme was but the reflection of the data of sense, and chiefly of sight, a reduction to the abstract, of the brilliant road he traveled on, through the sunshine.

But on the seventh evening there came a reaction in the cheerful flow of our traveler's thoughts; a reaction with which mere bodily fatigue, asserting itself at last over his curiosity, had much to do: and he fell into a mood, known to all passably sentimental wayfarers, as night deepens again and again over their path, in which all journeying from home, from the known to the unknown, comes suddenly to figure as a mere foolish truancy—like a child's running away—with the feeling that one had best return at once, even through the darkness. He had chosen to climb on foot, at his leisure, the long windings, by which the road ascended to a place where that day's stage was to end, and found himself alone in the twilight, far behind the rest of his traveling-companions. Would the last zigzag, round and round those dark masses, half natural rock, half artificial substructure, ever bring him within the circuit of the walls above? Just then, a startling incident turned those misgivings almost into actual fear. From the steep slope, a heavy mass of stone was detached, after some whisperings among the trees above his head, and rushing down through the stillness fell to pieces in a cloud of dust across the road just behind him, so that he felt the touch upon his heel. That was sufficient, just then, to rouse out of its hiding-place his old vague fear of evil—of one's "enemies"—a distress, so much a matter of constitution with him, that at times it would seem that the best pleasures of life could but be snatched, as it were hastily, in just one moment's forgetfulness of its dark, besetting influence. A sudden suspicion of hatred against him, of the nearness of "enemies," seemed all at once to alter the visible form of things, as with the child's hero, when he found the footprint on the sand of his peaceful, dreamy island. His elaborate philosophy had not put beneath his feet the terror of mere bodily evils; much less of "inexorable fate and the noise of greedy Acheron."

The resting-place to which he presently came, in the keen wholesome air of the market-place of the little hill-town, was a pleasant contrast to that last effort of his journey. The room in which he sat down to sup, unlike the majority of Roman inns at that day, was neat and fresh. The firelight danced cheerfully upon the polished, three-wicked lucernæ, burning cleanly with the best oil, upon the whitewashed walls, and the bunches of scarlet carnations set in glass goblets. The white wine of the place put before him, of the true color and flavor of the grape, and with a little ring of delicate foam as it mounted in the glass, had a reviving edge or freshness in it, which he had found in no other wine. These things had relieved a little the melancholy of the hour before; and it was just then that he heard the voice of one, newly arrived at the inn, making his way to the upper floor—a youthful voice, with a reassuring clearness of note, which completed his cure.

He seemed to hear that voice again in his dreams, uttering his own name; and waking in the full morning light and gazing from the window, saw the guest of the night before, a very honorable-looking youth, in the rich habit of a military knight, standing beside his horse, and already making preparations to depart. It happened that Marius, too, was to make that day's journey on horseback. Riding presently from the inn, he overtook Cornelius—of the Twelfth Legion—advancing carefully down the steep street; and before they had issued from the gates of Urbs-Vetus, the two young men had broken into talk together. They were passing along the street of the goldsmiths; and Cornelius must needs enter one of the workshops for the repair of some button or link of his knightly trappings. Standing in the doorway, Marius watched the work, as he had watched the braziers' business a few days before, wondering most at the simplicity of its processes, a simplicity, however, on which only genius in that craft could have lighted.—By what unguessed-at stroke of hand, for instance, had the grains of precious metal associated themselves with so daintily regular a roughness, over the surface of the little casket yonder? And the conversation which followed, hence arising, left the two travelers with sufficient interest in each other to insure an easy companionship for the remainder of their journey. In time to come, Marius was to depend very much on the preferences, the personal judgments, of the comrade who now laid his hand so brotherly on his shoulder, as they left the workshop.

Itineris matutini gratiam capimus—quoted one: and their road that day lay through a country, well fitted, by the peculiarity of its landscape, to ripen a first acquaintance into intimacy; its superficial ugliness throwing the wayfarers back upon each other's entertainment in a real exchange of ideas; the tension of which, however, it would relieve, ever and anon, by the unexpected assertion of a singular attractiveness. The superficial aspect of the land was, indeed, in spite of its abundant ilex and olive, unpleasing enough. A river of clay seemed "in some old night of time" to have burst up over valley and hill, and hardened there, into fantastic shelves and slides and angles of cadaverous rock, up and down among the contorted vegetation; the hoary roots and trunks seeming to confess some weird kinship with them. But that was long ago; and these pallid hillsides needed only the declining sun, touching the rock with purple, and throwing deeper shadow into the immemorial foliage, to put on a peculiar, because a very austere and grave, kind of beauty; while the graceful outlines common to volcanic hills asserted themselves in the broader prospect. And, for sentimental Marius, all this associated itself, by a perhaps fantastic affinity, with a peculiar trait of severity, beyond his guesses as to the secret of it, which mingled with the blitheness of his new companion. Concurring, indeed, with the condition of a Roman soldier, it was certainly something far more than the expression of military hardness, or ascésis; and what was earnest, or austere even, in the landscape they had traversed together, seemed to have been waiting for the passing of this figure to interpret or inform it. Again, as in his early days with Flavian, a vivid personal presence broke through the dreamy idealism, which had almost come to doubt of other men's reality—reassuringly, indeed; yet not without some sense of a constraining tyranny over him, from without.

For Cornelius, returning from the campaign, to take up his quarters on the Palatine, in the imperial guard, seemed to carry about with him, in that real world of comely usages and privileges to which he belonged, the atmosphere of some still more jealous and exclusive circle. They halted at noon next day, not at an inn, but at the house of one of the young soldier's friends; whom they found absent, indeed, in consequence of the plague in those parts, so that after a mid-day rest only, they proceeded again on their journey. The great room of the villa, to which they were admitted, had lain long untouched; and the dust rose, as they entered, into the slanting bars of sunlight, which fell through the half-closed shutters. It was here, to while away the time, that Cornelius bethought himself of displaying to his new friend the various articles and ornaments of his knightly array—the breastplate, the sandals and cuirass, lacing them on, one by one, with the assistance of Marius, and finally the great golden bracelet on the right arm, conferred on him by his general for an act of valor. And as he gleamed there, amid that odd interchange of light and shade, with the staff of his silken standard fast in his hand, Marius felt as if he were looking, for the first time, on a new knighthood or chivalry, just then coming into the world.

It was soon after they left this place, journeying now by carriage, that Rome was seen at last, with much excitement on the part of our travelers; Cornelius, with some others of whom the party now consisted, agreeing, chiefly for the sake of Marius, to hasten forward, that it might be reached by daylight, with a cheerful noise of rapid wheels as they passed over the flagstones. But the highest light upon the mausoleum of Hadrian had quite gone out, and it was dark, before they reached the Flaminian Gate. The abundant sound of water was the one thing that impressed Marius, as they passed down a long street, with many open spaces on either hand—Cornelius to his military quarters, and Marius to the old dwelling-place of his fathers.

CHAPTER XI.

THE MOST RELIGIOUS CITY IN THE WORLD.

MARIUS awoke early and passed curiously from room to room, noting for more careful inspection by and by the rolls of manuscripts. Even greater than his curiosity in gazing for the first time on this old possession of his ancestors, was his eagerness to look out upon Rome itself, as he pushed back curtain and shutter and stepped forth in the fresh morning upon one of the many balconies, with an oft-repeated dream realized at last. He was certainly fortunate in the time of his coming to Rome. That old pagan world, of which Rome was the flower, had reached its perfection in the things of poetry and art—a perfection which indicated but too surely the eve of its decline. As in some vast intellectual museum, all the manifold products of that world were intact and in their places, and with custodians, also, still extant, duly qualified to appreciate and explain them. And at no period of its history had the material Rome itself been better worth seeing; lying there, as complete as that world of pagan intellect which it represented in every phase of darkness and light; the various work of many ages falling harmoniously together in it, and as yet untouched save by time, adding the final grace of a rich softness to its complex expression. Much which spoke of ages earlier than that of Nero, the great rebuilders, lingered on, antique, quaint, immeasurably venerable, like the relics of the medieval city in the Paris of Lewis the Fourteenth ; while the work of Nero's own time had come to have the sort of old-world and picturesque interest, which the work of Lewis has for ourselves : and without stretching a parallel too far, we might perhaps liken the architectural finesses of the archaic Hadrian to the more excellent products of our own Gothic revival. The temple of Antoninus and Faustina was still fresh in all the majesty of its closely arrayed columns of cipollino ; but, on the whole, little had been added under the late and present emperors, and during fifty years of public quiet, a sober brown and gray had grown apace on things. The gilding on the roof of many a temple had lost its garishness : cornice and capital of polished marble shone out with all the crisp freshness of real flowers, amid the already moldering travertine and brickwork, though the birds had built freely among them. What Marius then saw was in many respects, after all deduction of differences, more like the modern Rome than the mention of special losses might lead us to suppose ; the Renaissance, in its most ambitious mood and with amplest resources, having resumed the ancient classical tradition there, with no break or obstruction, as it happened, in any very considerable work of the middle age, which had here left behind but slight residue of itself. Immedi ately before him, on the square, steep height, where the earliest little old Rome had huddled itself together, arose the palace of the Cæsars. Half-veiling the vast substruction of rough, brown stone—line upon line of successive ages of builders—the trim, old-fashioned garden walks, under their closely-woven walls of dark glossy foliage, the test of long and careful cultivation, wound gradually, among choice trees, statues and fountains, distinct and sparkling in the full morning sunlight, to the richly tinted mass of pavilions and corridors above, centering in the lofty, white-marble dwelling-place of Apollo himself.

How often had Marius looked forward to that first, free wandering through Rome, to which he now went forth, with a heat in the town sunshine (like a mist of fine gold-dust spread through the air) to the height of his desire, making the dun coolness of the narrow streets welcome enough at intervals. He almost feared, as he descended the stair hastily, lest some unforeseen accident might snatch the little cup of enjoyment from him before he passed the door. It had always been in these morning wanderings in places new to him, that life seemed to come at its fullest, and he could feel his youth, the youth whose days of reality he had already begun to count jealously, in full possession. So, the grave, pensive figure, a figure far fresher than often came across it now, moved through the old city, certainly not by the most direct course, though eager to join the friend of yesterday, to the lodgings of Cornelius.

Bent as keenly on seeing, as if this first day of Marius in Rome were to be also his last, the two friends descended along the Vicus Tuscus, with its rows of incense-stalls, into the Via Nova, where the fashionable people were busy shopping; and Marius saw with much amusement the frizzled heads, then à la mode. A glimpse of the marmorata, the haven at the riverside, where specimens of all the precious marbles of the world were lying amid great white blocks from the quarries of Luna, took his thoughts for a moment to his distant home. They visited the flower-market, lingering where the coronarii pressed on them the newest species, and purchased zinnias (like painted flowers, thought Marius) then in blossom, to decorate the folds of their togas. Loitering to the other side of the Forum, past the great Galen's drug-shop, after a glance at the announcements of the new poems attached to one of the door-posts of a famous bookseller, they entered the curious library of the Temple of Peace, then a favorite resort of literary men, and read, fixed there for all to see, the Diurnal or Gazette of the day, which announced, together with births and deaths, prodigies and accidents, and much mere matter of business, the date and manner of the philosophic emperor's joyful return to his people; and also, thereafter, with eminent names faintly disguised, what would carry that day's news, in many copies, over the provinces—a certain matter concerning the great lady, known to be dear to him, whom he had left at home. It was a story, with the development of which the town had indeed for some time past amused or edified itself, rallying sufficiently from its panic of a year ago, not only to welcome back its ruler, but also to relish a chronique scandaleuse; so that when, soon after, Marius saw the world's wonder, he was already acquainted with the suspicions which have ever since hung about her name. It was twelve o'clock before they left the Forum, having waited in a little crowd to hear the Accensus, according to old custom, proclaim the hour of noon-day, at the moment when, from the steps of the Senate-house, he could see the sun standing between the Rostra and the Græcostasis. He exerted for that function a strength of voice, which confirmed in Marius a judgment the modern visitor may share with him, and which he had formed in part the night before, noting, as a religious procession passed him, how much noise a man and a boy could make, though not without a great deal of real music, of which, indeed, the Romans were then as ever passionately fond—the judgment, namely, that Roman throats and chests must, in some particular way, be differently constructed from those of other people.

Hence the two friends took their way through the Via Flaminia, almost along the line of the modern Corso, already bordered with handsome villas, turning presently to the left, into the Field-of-Mars, still the playground of Rome. But the vast public edifices had grown to be almost continuous over the grassy expanse, represented now only by occasional open spaces of grass and wild-flowers.

In one of these a crowd was standing, to watch a party of athletes who had stripped for exercise. Marius had been surprised at the luxurious variety of the litters borne through Rome, where no carriage-horses were allowed; and just then one far more sumptuous than the rest, with dainty appointments of ivory and gold, was carried by, all the town pressing eagerly to get a glimpse of its most beautiful woman, as she passed rapidly. Yes! there was the wonder of the world—the empress Faustina herself: Marius could distinguish—could distinguish clearly—the well-known profile between the floating purple curtains.

For indeed all Rome was ready to burst into gayety again, as it awaited with much real affection, hopeful and animated, the return of its emperor: in honor of whose ovation various adornments were preparing along the streets through which the imperial procession would pass. He had left Rome just twelve months before, amid immense gloom. The alarm of a barbarian insurrection along the whole line of the Danube had come at the moment when Rome was panic-stricken by the great pestilence.

In fifty years of peace, broken only by that conflict in the east, from which Lucius Verus had brought back the plague among other curiosities, war had come to seem but a mere romantic, superannuated incident of bygone history; and now it was almost upon Italian soil. Terrible were the reports of the numbers and audacity of the assailants. Aurelius, as yet untried in war, and understood by a few only in the whole scope of a really great character, was known to the majority of his subjects as but a careful administrator, and a, perhaps dilettante, student of philosophy. But he was also the visible center of government, towards which the hearts of a whole people turned, grateful for fifty years of public happiness—its good genius, its “Antonine”—whose fragile frame might be foreseen speedily giving way, under the fatigues of military life, with a disaster like that of the slaughter of the legions by Arminius. Prophecies of the world’s impending conflagration were easily credited; “the secular fire” would descend from heaven; superstitious fear had even demanded a human victim.

Marcus Aurelius, always philosophically considerate of the humors of other people, and giving way to that devout appreciation of every religious pretension which was one of his most characteristic habits of mind, had invoked, in aid of the commonwealth, not only all native gods, but all foreign deities also, however strange—“Help! Help! in the ocean space!”—Multitudes of foreign priests had been welcomed to Rome, with their various peculiar religious rites. The sacrifices made on this occasion were remembered for centuries; and the starving poor, at least, had the profit of the flesh of those herds of “white bulls,” which came into the city day after day, to yield the savor of their blood and breath to the gods.

Even after all that, the legions had but followed their standards despondently. But prestige, personal prestige, the name of emperor, still had its magic power over the nations. The mere march of the Roman army made an impression on the barbarians. Aurelius and his colleague had hardly reached Aquileia when a deputation arrived to ask for peace ; and now the two imperial "brothers" were returning home at leisure ; were waiting, indeed, at a villa outside the walls, till the capital had made itself ready to receive them. But although Rome was thus in gay reaction, with much relief, and hopefulness against the winter, facing itself industriously in damask of red and gold, those two enemies were still unmistakably extant : the barbarians of the Danube had but been over-awed for a season ; and the plague, as we saw when Marius was on his way to Rome, was not to depart till it had done a large part in the formation of the melancholy picturesque of modern Italy—till it had made, or prepared for the making, of the Roman Campagna. The old, unaffected, really pagan gayety and peace of Antoninus Pius—that true unconscious humanist—had gone forever. And, again and again, throughout this day of varied observation, Marius had been reminded, above all else, that he was not merely in "the most religious city of the world," as one had said, but that Rome had become the romantic home of the wildest superstition. It presented itself almost as religious mania, in many an incident of his long ramble—incidents to which he gave his full attention, though contending in some measure with a reluctance on the part of his companion, the motive of which he did not understand till long afterwards. Marius certainly did not allow the reluctance of Cornelius, in this matter, to deter his own curiosity. Had he not come to Rome partly under poetic vocation, to receive all those things, the very impress of life itself, upon the visual, the imaginative, organ, as upon a mirror? to reflect them, to transmute them into golden words? He must observe that strange medley of superstition, that centuries' growth, layer upon layer, of the curiosities of religion (one faith jostling another out of its place) at least for its picturesque interest; and as an indifferent outsider might; not too deeply concerned in the question which, if any of them, was to be the survivor.

Superficially, at least, the Roman religion, allying itself with much diplomatic economy to possible rivals, was in possession, as a vast and complex system of usage, intertwining itself with every detail of public and private life, attractively enough for those who had but "the historic temper," and a taste for the past: however much a Lucian might depreciate it. Roman religion, as Marius knew, had, indeed, been always something to be done, rather than something to be thought, or believed, or loved; something to be done in minutely detailed manner, at a particular time and place, correctness in all which had long been a matter of laborious learning with a whole school of ritualists—and, as such, also, now and again, a matter of heroic sacrifice with certain exceptionally devout souls, as when Caius Fabius Dorso, with his life in his hand, succeeded in passing the sentinels of the invading Gauls in order to perform a hereditary sacrifice on the Quirinal, and, thanks to the divine protection, had returned in safety. So jealous was the distinction between sacred and profane, that, in the matter of the "regarding of days," it had made more than half the year a holiday. Aurelius had, indeed, ordained that there should be no more than a hundred and thirty-five festival days in the year; but in other respects he had followed in the steps of his predecessor, Antoninus Pius—commended especially for his religion, his conspicuous devotion to its public ceremonies—and whose coins are remarkable for their references to the oldest and most hieratic types of Roman mythology. Aurelius had succeeded in more than healing the old feud between philosophy and religion; displaying himself, in singular combination, as at once the most zealous of philosophers and the most devout of polytheists, and lending himself, with an air of conviction, to all the pageantries of public worship. To his pious recognition of that one orderly spirit, which, according to the doctrine of the Stoics, diffuses itself through the world, and animates it—a recognition which in him took the form of constant effort towards an inward likeness thereto, in the order and harmony of his own soul—he had added a warm personal devotion towards the whole multitude of the old national gods, and a great many new foreign ones besides, by him, at least, not ignobly conceived; in something like the way (if the comparison may be reverently made) in which the Catholic Church has added the cultus of the saints to its worship of the one Divine Being.

And to the view of the majority, though the emperor, as the personal center of religion, entertained the hope of converting his people to philosophic faith, and had even pronounced certain public discourses for their instruction in it, that polytheistic devotion was his most striking feature. Philosophers, indeed, had, for the most part, thought with Seneca, "that man need not lift his hands to heaven, nor ask the sacristan's leave to put his mouth to the ear of an image, in order that his prayer may be heard the better." Marcus Aurelius, "a master in Israel," knew all that well enough; yet his outward devotion was much more than a concession to popular sentiment, and a mere result of that sense of fellow-citizenship with others, which had made him again and again, under most difficult circumstances, an excellent comrade. Those others, too—what were they, with all their ignorances, but instruments in the administration of that Divine Reason, "from end to end sweetly and strongly disposing all things?"—Meantime "Philosophy" itself had assumed much of what we conceive to be the religious character. It had even cultivated the power and the habit of "spiritual direction," the troubled soul making recourse in its hour of destitution, or amid the distractions of the world, to this or that director —philosopho suo—who could really best understand it.

And it had been in vain that the old, discreet and grave religion of Rome had set itself, according to its proper genius, to prevent or subdue all trouble and disturbance in men's souls. In religion, as in other things, plebeians had a taste for movement, for revolution; and it had ever been in the most populous quarters that religious changes had begun. It was to the apparatus of foreign religion, above all, that recourse was made in times of public disquietude or sudden terror; and in those great religious celebrations, before proceeding against the barbarians, Aurelius had even restored the solemnities of Isis, prohibited in the capital since the time of Augustus, and made no secret of his worship of that goddess, whose temple had been actually pulled down in the reign of Tiberius. Her singular, and in many ways beautiful, ritual was now popular in Rome. And then—what the enthusiasm of the swarming plebeian quarters had initiated, was sure to be adopted, sooner or later, by women of fashion. A blending of all the religions of the ancient world had been accomplished. The new gods had arrived; had been welcomed, and found their places; though, in truth, with no real security, in any adequate ideal of the divine nature in the background of men's minds, that the presence of the newcomer should be edifying, or even refining. High and low alike, addressed themselves to all of them without scruple; confounding them with each other in their prayers, and in the old, authorized, threefold veneration of their visible images, by flowers, incense, and ceremonial lights—those beautiful usages, which the church, in her way through the world, ever making spoil of the world's goods for the better uses of the human spirit, took up and sanctified in her service.

And certainly "the most religious city in the world" made no secret of its devotion, however fantastic. The humblest house had its little chapel or shrine set apart for an image, and its lamp: and almost every one seemed to have some religious function and responsibility. Colleges, composed for the most part of slaves, provided for the service of the Compitalian Lares—the gods who presided, respectively, over the several quarters of the city; and, in one street, Marius witnessed an incident of the festival of the patron deity of that quarter; the way being strewn with box, and the houses gay with outspread carpets and garlands, as the ancient idol was borne through it in procession, arrayed in curious and costly robes. Numerous religious, or partly religious clubs had their stated anniversaries, on which the members issued with much ceremony from their guild-hall, or schola, and traversed the streets of Rome, preceded by their sacred banners, like the confraternities of the present day, to offer sacrifice before some famous image. Black with the perpetual smoke of lamps and incense, oftenest old and ugly, perhaps on that account the more likely to listen to the desires of the suffering—had not those sacred effigies sometimes given sensible tokens that they were aware ! The image of Fortuna Muliebris in the Via Latina, had spoken (not once only) and declared ; Bene me matronæ vidistis riteque dedicastis ! The Apollo of Cumæ had wept during three whole days and nights. The images in the temple of Juno Sospita had been seen to sweat. Nay ! there was blood—divine blood—in the heart of some of them ; the images in the Grove of Feronia had sweated blood !

From one and all Cornelius had turned aside ; like the “atheist,” of whom Apuleius tells, he had never once put his hand to his lips in passing image or sanctuary, and had parted from Marius finally when he determined to enter the crowded doorway of a temple on their return into the Forum, below the Palatine hill, where the mothers were pressing in, with swarms of every sort of children, to touch the lightning-struck image of the wolf-nurse of Romulus—so tender to little ones!—just discernible in its dark shrine, amid a blaze of lights. Marius gazed after his companion of the day, as he mounted the steps to his lodging, singing to himself, as it seemed :—Marius could not distinctly catch the words.

And, as the fresh, rich evening came on, there was heard all over Rome, far above a whisper, the whole town seeming hushed to catch it distinctly, the lively, reckless call to “play,” from the sons and daughters of foolishness, to those in whom their life was still green—Donec virenti canities abest !—Donec virenti canities abest ! Marius could hardly doubt how Cornelius would have taken the call.

And as for himself, slight as was the burden of positive moral obligation, with which he had entered Rome, it was to no wasteful and vagrant affections, such as these, that his Epicureanism had committed him.

CHAPTER XII.

THE DIVINITY THAT DOTH HEDGE A KING.

But ah ! Mæcenas is yclad in claye,
And great Augustus long ygoe is dead,
And all the worthies ligger wrapt in lead,
That matter made for poets on to playe.

MARCUS AURELIUS who, though he had little relish for them himself, had been ever willing to humor the taste of his people for magnificent spectacles, was received back to Rome with the lesser honors of the Ovation ; conceded by the Senate, so great was the public sense of deliverance, with even more than the laxity which had become habitual to it under imperial rule, for there had been no actual bloodshed in the late achievement. Clad in the civic dress of the chief Roman magistrate, and with a crown of myrtle upon his head, his colleague similarly attired walking beside him, he passed on foot in solemn procession, along the Sacred Way up to the Capitol, to offer sacrifice to the national gods. The victim, a goodly sheep, whose image we may still see, between the pig and the ox of the Suovetaurilia, filleted and stoled almost like ancient canons, on a sculptured fragment in the Forum, was conducted by the priests, clad in rich white vestments, and bearing their sacred utensils of massy gold, immediately behind a company of flute-players, led by the great master, or conductor, of that day; visibly tetchy or delighted, according as the instruments he ruled with his tuning-rod, rose, more or less perfectly amid the difficulties of the way, to the dream of perfect music in the soul within him. The vast crowd, in which were mingled the soldiers of the triumphant army, now restored to wives and children, all alike in holiday whiteness, had left their houses early in the fine, dry morning, in a real affection for "the father of his country," to await the procession; the two princes having spent the preceding night outside the walls, in the old Villa of the Republic. Marius, full of curiosity, had taken his position with much care; and stood to see the world's masters pass by, at an angle from which he could command the view of a great part of the processional route, sprinkled with fine yellow sand, and carefully guarded from profane footsteps.

The coming of the procession was announced by the clear sound of the flutes, heard at length above the acclamations of the people—Salve Imperator!—Dii te servent!—shouted in regular time, over the hills. It was on the central figure, of course, that the whole attention of Marius was fixed from the moment when the procession came in sight, preceded by the lictors with gilded fascēs, the imperial image-bearers, and pages carrying lighted torches; a band of knights, among whom was Cornelius in complete military array, following. Amply swathed about in the folds of a richly-worked toga, in a manner now long since become obsolete with meaner persons, Marius beheld a man of about five and forty years of age, with prominent eyes—eyes, which although demurely downcast during this essentially religious ceremony, were by nature broadly and benignantly observant. He was still, in the main, as we see him in the busts which represent his gracious and courtly youth, when Hadrian had playfully called him, not Verus, after his father, but Verissimus, for that candor of gaze, and the bland capacity of the brow; which, below the brown hair, clustering as thickly as of old, shone out low, broad, and clear, and still without a trace of the trouble of his lips. It was the brow of one who, amid the blindness or perplexity of the people about him, understood all things clearly; with that dilemma, to which his experience so far had brought him, between Chance with meek resignation, and a Providence with boundless possibilities and hope, for him at least distinctly defined.

That outward serenity, which, as a point of expression or manner not unworthy the attention of a public minister, he valued so highly (was it not an outward symbol of the inward religious serenity it had been his constant effort to maintain?) was increased to-day, by his sense of the gratitude of his people—that his life had been one of such gifts and blessings as made his person seem indeed divine to them. Yet the trace of some reserved internal sorrow, passing from time to time into an expression of effort and fatigue, of loneliness amid the shouting multitude, as if the sagacious hint of one of his officers—"The soldiers can't understand you: they don't know Greek"—were applicable generally to his relationships with other people, might have been read there by the more observant. The nostrils and mouth seemed capable even of peevishness; and Marius noted in them, as in the hands, and in the spare body as a whole, what was new in his experience—something of asceticism, as we say—of a bodily gymnastic, in which, although it told pleasantly in the clear blue humors of the eye, the flesh had scarcely been an equal gainer with the spirit. It was hardly the expression of "the healthy mind in the healthy body," but rather of a sacrifice of the body to the soul, its needs and aspirations, that Marius seemed to divine in this assiduous student of the Greek sages—a sacrifice, indeed, far beyond the demands of their very saddest philosophy of life.

Dignify thyself, with modesty and simplicity for thine ornaments!—had been a maxim with this dainty and high-bred Stoic; who still thought manners a true part of morals, according to the old sense of the term, and who regrets, now and again, that he cannot control his thoughts equally well with his countenance. That outward composure was deepened during the solemnities of this day by an air of pontifical abstractedness; which though very far from being pride, and a sort of humility rather, yet gave, to himself, an aspect of unapproachableness, and to his whole proceeding, in which every minutest act was considered, the character of a ritual. Certainly, there was no haughtiness, social, moral, or philosophic even, in Aurelius, who had realized, under more trying conditions perhaps than any one before him, that no element of humanity could be alien to him. Yet, as he walked to-day, the center of ten thousand observers, with eyes discreetly fixed on the ground, veiling his head at times and muttering very rapidly the words of the "supplications," there was something which many a spectator must have noted, again as a new thing; for, unlike his predecessors, Aurelius took all that with absolute seriousness. The doctrine of the sanctity of kings, that in the words of Tacitus, Princes are as Gods—Principes instar deorum esse,—seemed to have taken a new and true sense. For Aurelius, indeed, the old legend of his descent from Numa—from Numa who had talked with the gods—meant much. Attached in very early years to the service of the altars, like many another noble youth, he was "observed to perform all his sacerdotal functions with a constancy and exactness unusual at that age; was soon a master of the sacred music; and had all the forms and ceremonies by heart." And now, as the emperor, who had not only a vague divinity about his person, but was actually the chief religious functionary of the state, recited from time to time the formulas of invocation, he needed not the help of the prompter, or ceremoniarius, who then approached, to assist him by whispering the appointed words in his ear. It was that pontifical collectedness which then impressed itself on Marius as the leading outward characteristic of Aurelius; and to him alone, perhaps, in that vast crowd of observers, it was no strange thing, but a thing he had understood from of old.

Some fanciful writers have assigned the origin of these triumphal processions to the mythic pomps of Dionysus, after his conquests in the East; the very word triumph being, according to this supposition, only Thriambos—the Dionysiac Hymn. And certainly the younger of the two imperial “brothers,” who, with the effect of a strong contrast, walked beside Aurelius, and shared the honors of the day, might well have reminded many of the delicate Greek god of flowers and wine. This new conqueror of the East was now about thirty-six years old, but with his punctilious care for all his advantages of person, and his soft curling beard powdered with gold, looked many years younger. It was one of the best fruits of the more genial element in the wisdom of Aurelius that, amid very difficult circumstances, he had known throughout life how to act in union with persons of character very different from his own; to be more than loyal to the colleague, the younger brother in empire, he had too lightly taken to himself, five years before, then an uncorrupt youth, “skilled in manly exercises and fitted for war.” When Aurelius thanks the gods that a brother had fallen to his lot, whose character was a stimulus to the proper care of his own, one sees that that could only have happened by way of an example, warning him against insidious faults. But it is with sincere amiability that the imperial writer, who was indeed little used to be ironical, adds that the lively respect and affection of the junior had often "gladdened" him. To be able to make his use of the flower, when the fruit perhaps was useless or poisonous—that, was one of the practical successes of his philosophy; and his people noted, with a blessing, the concord of the two Augusti.

The younger, certainly, had to the full that charm of a constitutional freshness of aspect which may defy for a long time extravagant or erring habits of life; a physiognomy healthy-looking, cleanly, and firm, which seemed unassociable with any form of self-tormenting, and made one think of the nozzle of some young hound or roe, such as human beings invariably like to stroke—with all the goodliness, that is, of the finer sort of animalism, though still wholly animal. It was the charm of the blond head, the unshrinking gaze, the warm tints:—neither more nor less than one may see every English summer, in youth, manly enough, and with the stuff in it which makes brave soldiers, in spite of the natural kinship it seems to have with playthings and gay flowers. Lucius Verus, indeed, had had a more than womanly fondness for fond things, which had made the atmosphere of the old city of Antioch, heavy with centuries of voluptuousness, a poison to him: he had come to love his delicacies best out of season, and would have gilded the very flowers. But, with a marvelous power of self-obliteration, the elder brother at the capital had directed his procedure successfully, and allowed him, now also the husband of his daughter Lucilla, the credit of a conquest, though Verus had certainly not returned a victor over himself. He had returned, as we know, with the plague in his company, along with many another strange creature of his folly ; and when the people saw him publicly feeding his favorite horse Fleet with almonds and sweet grapes, wearing the animal's image in gold, and finally building him a tomb, they felt, with some unsentimental misgiving, that he might revive the manners of Nero.—What if, in the chances of war, he should survive the protecting genius of that elder brother ?

He was all himself to-day : and it was with much wistful curiosity that Marius regarded him. For Lucius Verus was, indeed, but the highly expressive type of a class—the true son of his father, adopted by Hadrian. Lucius Verus the elder, also, had had that same strange capacity for misusing the adornments of life, with a masterly grace ; as if such misusing were, in truth, the quite adequate occupation of an intelligence, powerful, but distorted by cynical philosophy or some disappointment of the heart. It was almost a sort of genius, of which there had been instances in the imperial purple : it was to ascend the throne, a few years later, in the person of one, now a hopeful little lad in the palace ; and it had its following, of course, among the wealthy youth of Rome, who concentrated a very considerable force of shrewdness and tact upon minute details of attire and manner, as upon the one thing needful. Certainly, flowers were pleasant to the eye. Such things had even their sober use, as making the outside of human life superficially attractive, and thereby promoting the first steps towards friendship and social amity. But what precise place could there be for Verus, and his charm, in that Wisdom, that Order of Reason "reaching from end to end, sweetly and strongly disposing all things;" from the vision of which Aurelius came down, so tolerant of persons like him—a vision into which Marius also was competent to enter. Yet noting his actual perfection after his kind, his undeniable achievement of the select, in all minor things, Marius felt, with some suspicion of himself, that he entered into, and could understand, Lucius Verus too. There was a voice in that theory which he had brought to Rome with him, which whispered "nothing is either great nor small;" as there were times in which he could have thought that, as the "grammarian's," or the artist's ardor of soul may be satisfied by the perfecting of the theory of a sentence or the adjustment of two colors, so his own life also might have been filled by an enthusiastic quest after perfection—say, in the flowering and folding of a toga.

The emperors had burned incense before the image of Jupiter, arrayed in his most gorgeous apparel, amid sudden shouts from the people of Salve Imperator! turned now from the living princes to the deity, as they discerned his countenance through the great opened door. The imperial brothers had deposited their crowns of myrtle on the richly embroidered lap-cloth of the image; and, with their chosen guests, had sat down to a public feast in the temple itself. And then followed, what was, after all, the great event of the day; an appropriate discourse—a discourse almost wholly de contemptu mundi—pronounced in the presence of the assembled Senate, by the emperor Aurelius; who had thus, on certain rare occasions, condescended to instruct his people, with the double authority of a chief pontiff and a laborious student of philosophy. In those lesser honors of the ovation, there had been no attendant slave behind the emperors, to make mock of their effulgence as they went; and it was as if, timorous, as a discreet philosopher might be, of a jealous Nemesis, he had determined himself to protest in time against the vanity of all outward success.

It was in the vast hall of the Curia Julia that the Senate was assembled to hear the emperor's discourse. A crowd of high-bred youths, who had near relations among its members, were idling around on the steps before the doors, in the marvelous toilets Marius had noticed in the Via Nova; in attendance, as usual, to learn by observation all the delicacies of the senatorial procedure. Marius had already some acquaintance among them, and passing on found himself suddenly in the presence of what was still the most august assembly the world had seen. Under Aurelius, ever full of veneration for this ancient traditional guardian of public religion, the Senate had recovered all its old dignity and independence. Among its members, many hundreds in number, as the grandest of them all, Marius noted the great sophists or rhetoricians of the day, in all their magnificence. The antique character of their attire, and the ancient mode of wearing it, still surviving with them, added to the imposing character of their persons, as they sat, with their staves of ivory in their hands, on their curule chairs (almost the exact pattern of the chair, still in use in the Roman church when a Bishop pontificates at the divine offices) “tranquil and unmoved, with a majesty that seemed divine,” as Marius thought, like the old Gaul of the Invasion. The rays of the early November sunset slanted full upon the audience, and compelled the officers of the Court to draw the purple curtains over the windows, adding to the solemnity of the scene. In the depth of those warm shadows, surrounded by her noble ladies, the empress Faustina was seated to listen. The beautiful Greek statue of Victory, which ever since the days of Augustus had presided over the assemblies of the Senate, had been brought into the hall, and placed near the chair of the emperor; who, after rising to perform a brief sacrificial service in its honor, bowing reverently to the assembled fathers left and right, took his seat and began to speak.

There was a certain melancholy grandeur in the very simplicity or triteness of the theme; as it were the very quintessence of all the old Roman epitaphs; of all that was monumental in that city of tombs, layer upon layer of dead things and people. As if in the very fervor of disillusion, he seemed to be composing—ὡςπερ ἐπιγραφὰς χρόνων καὶ ὅλων ἔθνων—the sepulchral titles of ages and whole peoples—nay! the very epitaph of the living Rome itself. The grandeur of the ruins of Rome—heroism in ruin:—it was under the influence of an imaginative anticipation of that, that he appeared to be speaking. And though the impression of the actual greatness of Rome on that day was but enhanced by this strain of contempt, falling with an accent of pathetic conviction from the emperor himself, and gaining from his pontifical pretensions the authority of a religious intimation, yet the curious interest of the discourse lay in this, that Marius, as he listened, seemed to foresee a grass-grown Forum, the broken ways of the Capitol, and the Palatine hill itself in humble occupation: and this impression connected itself with what he had already noted of an actual change that was coming over Italian scenery. Throughout, he could trace something of a humor into which Stoicism at all times tends to fall, the tendency to cry, Abase yourselves! With the almost inhuman impassibility of one who had thought too closely on the paradoxical aspect of the love of posthumous fame, with the ascetic pride which lurks, in spite of its poetry, in all Platonism, resultant from its opposition of the seer to the unseen, as falsehood to truth—the imperial Stoic, like his true descendant, the hermit of the middle age, was ready, in no friendly humor, to mock, there in its narrow bed, the corpse, which had made so much of itself in life. Marius could but contrast all that with his own Cyrenaic eagerness, just then, to taste and see and touch ; reflecting on the opposite issues deducible from the same text. "The world without and within me flows away like a river ; " he had said, "therefore let me make the most of what is here and now."—"The world and the thinker upon it, are consumed like a flame ; " said Aurelius, "therefore let us turn away our eyes from vanity ; and renounce and withdraw ourselves alike from all affections." He seemed tacitly to claim it as a sort of personal dignity, that he was very familiarly versed in that view of things, and could discern death's head everywhere. Now and again, Marius was reminded of the saying that "with the Stoics all people are the vulgar save themselves : " and at times the orator seemed to have forgotten his audience, and to be speaking only to himself.

"Art thou in love with men's praises, get thee into the very soul of them, and see !—see what judges they be, even in those matters which concern themselves. Wouldst thou have their praises after death, bethink thee, that they who shall come hereafter, and with whom thou wouldst survive by thy great name, will be but as these, whom here thou hast found so hard to live with. For of a truth, his soul who is aflutter upon renown after death, presents not this aright to itself, that of all whose memory he would have each one will likewise very quickly depart, and thereafter, again, he also who shall receive that from him, until memory herself be put out, as she journeys on by means of such as are themselves on the wing but for a while, and are extinguished in their turn.—Making so much of those, thou wilt never see ! It is as if thou wouldst have had those who were before thee discourse fair things concerning thee.

“ To him, indeed, whose wit hath been whetted by true doctrine, that well-worn sentence of Homer sufficeth, to guard him against regret and fear—

Like the race of leaves

The race of man is :—

The wind in autumn strows

The earth with old leaves : then the spring the woods with new endows—

Leaves ! little leaves !—thy children, thy flatterers, thine enemies ! Leaves in the wind, those who would devote thee to darkness, who scorn or miscall thee here, even as they also whose great fame shall outlast them. For all these, and the like of them, are born indeed in the spring season—ἔαρος ἐπιτίγνεται ὥρη—and soon a wind hath scattered them, and thereafter the wood peopleth itself again with another generation of leaves. And what is common to all of them is but the littleness of their lives : and yet wouldst thou love and hate, as if these things should continue forever. In a little while thine eyes also will be closed, and he on whom thou perchance hast leaned thyself be himself a burden upon another.

“ Bethink thee often of the swiftness with which the things that are, or are even now coming to be, are swept past thee : that the very substance of them is but the perpetual motion of water ; that there is almost nothing which continueth : and that bottomless depth of time, so close at thy side. Folly ! to be lifted up, or sorrowful, or anxious, by reason of things like these! Think of infinite matter, and thy portion—how tiny a particle of it! of infinite time, and thine own brief point there; of destiny, and the jot thou art in it; and yield thyself readily to the wheel of Clotho, to spin thee into what web she will.

“As one casting a ball from his hand, the nature of things hath had its aim with every man, not as to the ending only, but the first beginning of his course, and passage thither. And hath the ball any profit of its rising, or loss as it descendeth again, or in its fall? or the bubble, as it groweth or breaketh on the air? or the flame of the lamp, from the beginning to the ending of its brief history?

“All but at this present that future is, in which nature, who disposeth all things in order, will transform whatsoever thou now seest, fashioning from its substance somewhat else, and therefrom somewhat else in its turn, lest the world should grow old. We are such stuff as dreams are made of—disturbing dreams. Awake, then! and see thy dream as it is, in comparison with that erewhile it seemed to thee.

“And for me, especially, it were well to mind those many mutations of empire in time past; therein peeping also upon the future, which must needs be of like species with what hath been, continuing ever within the rhythm and number of things which really are; so that in forty years one may note of man and his ways little less than in a thousand. Ah! from this higher place, look we down upon the shipwrecks and the calm! Consider, for example, how the world went, under the emperor Vespasian. They are married and given in marriage, they breed children; love hath its way with them; they heap up riches for others or for themselves; they are murmuring at things as then they are; they are seeking for great place; crafty, flattering, suspicious, waiting upon the death of others—festivals, business, war, sickness, dissolution: and now their whole life is no longer anywhere at all. Pass on to the reign of Trajan: all things continue the same: and that life also is no longer anywhere at all. Ah! but look again, and consider, one after another, as it were the sepulchral inscriptions of all peoples and times, according to one pattern—What multitudes, after their utmost striving—a little afterwards!—were dissolved again into their dust.

“Think again of life as it was far off in the old time; as it must be when we shall be gone; as it is now among the wild heathen. How many have never heard your names and mine, or will soon forget them. How soon may those who shout my name to-day begin to revile it, because glory, and the memory of men, and all things beside, are but vanity—a sand-heap under the senseless wind, the barking of dogs, the quarreling of children, weeping incontinently upon their laughter.

“This hasteth to be; that other to have been: of that which is now becoming, even now somewhat hath been extinguished. And wilt thou make thy treasure of any one of those things? It were as if one set his love upon the swallow, as it passeth out of sight through the air !

“ Bethink thee often, in all contentions public and private, of those whom men have remembered by reason of their anger and vehement spirit—those famous rages, and the occasions of them—the great fortunes, and misfortunes, of men’s strife of old. What are they all now, and the dust of their battles ? Dust and ashes indeed ; a fable, a mythus, or not so much as that. Yes ! keep those before thine eyes who took this or that, the like of which happeneth to thee, so hardly ; were so querulous, so agitated. And where again are they ? Wouldst thou have it not otherwise with thee ?

“ Consider how quickly all things vanish away—their bodily structure into the general substance of things ; the very memory of them into that great gulf and abysm of past thoughts. Ah ! ’tis on a tiny space of earth thou art creeping through life—a pigmy soul carrying a dead body to its grave. Consider all this with thyself, and let nothing seem great to thee.

“ Let death put thee upon the consideration both of thy body and thy soul—what an atom of all matter hath been distributed to thee ; what a little particle of the universal mind. Turn thy body about, and consider what thing it is, and that which old age, and lust, and the languor of disease can make of it. Or come to its substantial and causal qualities. its very type : contemplate that in itself, apart from the accidents of matter, and then measure also the span of time for which the nature of things, at the longest, will maintain that special type. Nay! in the very principles and first constituents of things corruption hath its part—so much dust, humor, stench, and scraps of bone! Consider that thy marbles are but the earth's callosities, thy gold and silver its fæces; this silken robe but a worm's bedding, and thy purple an unclean fish. Ah! and thy life's breath is not otherwise; as it passeth out of matters like these, into the like of them again.

“For the one soul in things, taking matter like wax into its hands, molds and remolds—how hastily!—beast, and plant, and the babe, in turn: and that which dieth hath not slipped out of the order of nature, but, remaining therein, hath also its changes there, disparting into those elements of which nature herself, and thou too, art compacted. She changes without murmuring. The oaken chest falls to pieces with no more complaining than when the carpenter fitted it together. If one told thee certainly that on the morrow thou shouldst die, or at the farthest on the day after, it would be no great matter to thee to die on the day after to-morrow, rather than to-morrow. Strive to think it a thing no greater that thou wilt die—not to-morrow, but a year, or two years, or ten years from to-day.

“I find that all things are now as they were in the days of our buried ancestors—all things sordid in their elements, trite by long usage and yet ephemeral. How ridiculous, then, how like a countryman in town, is he, who wonders at aught. Doth the sameness, the repetition of the public shows, weary thee? Even so doth that likeness of events make the spectacle of the world a vapid one. And so must it be with thee to the end. For the wheel of the world hath ever the same motion, upward and downward, from generation to generation. When, when, shall time give place to eternity?

“If there be things which trouble thee thou canst put them away, inasmuch as they have their being but in thine own notion concerning them. Consider what death is, and how, if one does but detach from it the notions and appearances that hang about it, resting the eye upon it as in itself it really is, it must be thought of but as an effect of nature, and that man but a child whom an effect of nature shall affright. Nay! not function and effect of nature, only; but a thing profitable also to herself.

“To cease from action—the ending of thine effort to think and do:—there is no evil in that. Turn thy thought to the ages of man’s life,—boyhood, youth, maturity, old age: the change in every one of those also is a dying, but evil nowhere. Thou climbedst into the ship, thou hast made thy voyage and touched the shore: go forth now! Be it into some other life; the divine breath is everywhere, even there. Be it into forgetfulness forever; at least thou wilt rest from the beating of sensible images upon thee, from the passions which pluck thee this way and that like an unfeeling toy, from those long marches of the intellect, from thy toilsome ministry to the flesh.

“ Art thou yet more than dust and ashes and bare bone—a name only, or not even that name, which also is but whispering and a resonance, kept alive from mouth to mouth of dying abjects who have hardly known themselves ; how much less thee, dead so long ago !

“ When thou lookest upon a wise man, a lawyer, a captain of war, think upon another gone. When thou seest thine own face in the glass, call up there before thee one of thine ancestors—one of those old Cæsars. Lo ! everywhere, they double before thee ! Thereon, let the thought occur to thee :—And where are they ? anywhere at all, forever ? And thou, thyself—how long ? Art thou blind to that thou art—thy matter, thy function, how temporal—the nature of thy business ? Yet tarry, at least, till thou hast assimilated even these things to thine own proper essence, as a quick fire turneth into heat and light whatsoever be cast upon it.

“ As words once in use are antiquated with us, so is it with the names that were once on all men’s lips—Camillus, Volesus, Leonnatus : then, in a little while, Scipio and Cato, and then Augustus, and then Hadrian, and then Antoninus Pius. How many great physicians who lifted wise brows at other men’s sick-beds, have sickened and died ? Those wise Chaldeans, who foretold, as a great matter, another man’s last hour, have themselves been taken by surprise. Ay ! and all those others, in their pleasant places—those who doated on a Capreæ like Tiberius, on their gardens, on the baths : Pythagoras and Socrates, who reasoned so closely upon immortality; Alexander, who used the lives of others as though his own should last forever—he and his mule-driver alike now!—one upon another. Well-nigh the whole court of Antoninus is extinct. Panthea and Pergamus sit no longer beside the sepulcher of their lord. The watchers over Hadrian's dust have slipped from his sepulcher.—It were jesting to stay longer. Did they sit there still, would the dead feel it? or feeling it, be glad; or glad, hold those watches forever? The time must come when they too shall be aged men and aged women, and de cease, and fail from their places; and what shift were there then for imperial service? This too is but the breath of the tomb, and a skinful of dead men's blood.

“Think again of those inscriptions, which belong not to one soul only, but to whole families—ἐσχάτος τοῦ ἰδίου γένους—he was the last of his race. Nay! of the burial of whole cities—Helice, Pompeii; of others, whose very burial-place is unknown.

“Thou hast been a citizen in this wide city.—Count not for how long, nor complain; since that which sends thee hence is no unrighteous judge, no tyrant; but Nature, who brought thee hither; as when a player leaves the stage at the bidding of the conductor who hired him. Sayest thou, ‘I have not played five acts.’ True! but in human life, three acts only make sometimes a complete play. That is the composer's business, not thine. Retire with a good will; for that too hath, perchance, a good will which dismisseth thee from thy part.”

The discourse ended almost in darkness, the evening having set in somewhat suddenly, with a heavy fall of snow. The torches which had been made ready to do him a useless honor were of real service now, as the emperor was solemnly conducted home; one man rapidly catching light from another—a long stream of moving lights across the white Forum, up the great stairs, to the palace. And, in effect, that night winter began, the hardest that had been known for a lifetime. The wolves came from the mountains; and, led by the carrion scent, devoured the dead bodies which had been hastily buried during the plague, and, emboldened by their meal, crept, before the short day was well past, over the walls of the farmyards of the Campagna. The eagles were seen driving the flocks of the smaller birds across the wintry sky. Only, in the city itself the winter was all the brighter for the contrast, among those who could pay for light and warmth. The habit-makers made a great sale of the spoil of all such furry creatures as had escaped wolves and eagles, for presents at the Saturnalia; and at no time had the winter roses from Carthage seemed more lustrously yellow and red.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE "MISTRESS AND MOTHER" OF PALACES.

AFTER that sharp, brief winter, the sun was already at work, softening leaf and bud, as you might feel by a faint sweetness in the air; but he did his work behind an evenly white sky, against which the abode of the Cæsars, its cypresses and bronze roofs, seemed like a picture in beautiful but melancholy color, as Marius climbed the long flights of steps to be introduced to the emperor Aurelius. Attired in the newest mode, his legs wound in dainty fasciæ of white leather, with the heavy gold ring of the ingenuus, and in his toga of ceremony, he retained still all his country freshness of complexion. The eyes of the "golden youth" of Rome were upon him as the chosen friend of Cornelius, and the destined servant of the emperor; but not jealously. In spite of, perhaps partly because of, his habitual reserve of manner, he had become "the fashion," even among those who felt instinctively the irony which lay beneath that remarkable self-possession, as of one taking all things with a difference from other people, perceptible in voice, in expression, and even in his dress. It was, in truth, the air of one who, entering vividly into life, and relishing to the full the delicacies of its intercourse, yet feels all the while, from the point of view of an ideal philosophy, that he is but conceding reality to suppositions, choosing of his own will to walk in a day-dream, of the illusiveness of which he, at least, is aware.

Marius had to wait in the house of the chief chamberlain for the due moment of admission to the emperor's presence. He was admiring the peculiar decoration of the walls, colored like rich old red leather (in the midst of one of them was depicted, under a trellis of fruit one might have gathered, the figure of a woman knocking at a door with wonderful reality of perspective), when the summons came; and in a few minutes, the etiquette of the imperial household being still simple, he had passed the curtains which divided the central hall of the palace into three parts—three degrees of approach to the sacred person, and was speaking to Aurelius himself; not in Greek, in which the emperor oftenest conversed with the learned, but more familiarly, in Latin, adorned however, or disfigured, by many a Greek phrase; as, now and again, French phrases have made the adornment of fashionable English. It was with real kindness that Marcus Aurelius looked upon Marius, as a youth of great attainments in Greek letters and philosophy; and he liked also his serious expression, being, as we know, a believer in the doctrine of physiognomy—that (as he puts it) not love only, but every other affection of man's soul, looks out very plainly from the window of the eyes.

It was a very ancient-looking apartment in which Marius found himself, richly adorned with the favorite toys of two or three generations of imperial collectors, now finally revised by the high connoisseurship of the Stoic emperor himself, though destined not much longer to remain together there. It is the repeated boast of Aurelius that he had learned from old Antoninus Pius to maintain authority without the constant use of guards, in a robe woven by the handmaids of his own consort, without processional lights and images, and "that a prince may shrink himself almost into the figure of a private gentleman." And yet, again as at the first sight of him, Marius was struck by the profound religiousness of the surroundings of the imperial presence. The effect might have been partly due to the very simplicity, the discreet and scrupulous simplicity, of the central figure in this splendid abode; but Marius could not forget that he saw before him not only the head of the Roman religion, but one who might actually have claimed something like divine worship, had he cared to do so. Though the fantastic pretensions of Caligula had brought some contempt on that claim, which had become almost a jest under the ungainly Claudius, yet, from Augustus downwards, a vague divinity had seemed to surround the Cæsars even in this life; and the peculiar character of Aurelius, at once a ceremonious polytheist never forgetful of his pontifical calling, and a philosopher whose mystic speculation surrounded him with a saintly halo, had resorted to his person, without his intending it, some of that divine prerogative and prestige. Though he would never allow the immediate dedication of altars to himself, yet the image of his Genius—his spirituality, or celestial counterpart—was placed among those of the divinized princes of the past; and his family, including Faustina and the young Commodus, was spoken of as the holy or divine house. Many a Roman courtier agreed with the barbarian chief, who, after contemplating one of the predecessors of Aurelius, withdrew from his presence with the exclamation—“ I have seen Gods to-day ! ” The very roof of his house, rising into a pediment or gable, like that of the sanctuary of a god, the laurels on either side its doorway, the chaplet of oak-leaves above, seemed to designate the place for religious veneration. And notwithstanding all this, the household of Aurelius was singularly modest, with none of the wasteful expense of palaces after the fashion of Lewis the Fourteenth; the palatial dignity being felt only in a peculiar orderliness, the absence of all that was casual of vulgarity and discomfort. A merely official residence of his predecessors, the Palatine had become the favorite dwelling-place of Aurelius; its many-colored memories suiting, perhaps, his pensive character, and the crude splendors of Nero and Hadrian being now subdued by time. The windowless Roman house must have had much of what to a modern would be gloom. How did the children, one wonders, endure houses with so little escape for the eye into the world outside? Aurelius, who had altered little else, choosing to live there in all the intimacy of home, had shifted, and made the most of, the level lights, and broken out a quite medieval window here and there, and the clear daylight, fully appreciated by his youthful visitor, made pleasant shadows among the objects of the imperial collection ; as some of them, by reason of their Greek simplicity and grace, themselves shone out like spaces of a purer, early light, amid the splendors of the later Roman manufacture.

Though he looked, thought Marius, like a man who did not sleep enough, he was abounding and bright to-day, after one of those pitiless headaches, which since boyhood had been the "thorn in his side," challenging the pretensions of his philosophy to fortify one in humble endurances. At the first moment, to Marius, remembering the spectacle of the emperor in ceremony, it was almost bewildering to be in private conversation with him. There was much in the philosophy of Aurelius—much consideration of mankind at large, of great bodies, aggregates and generalities, after the Stoic manner—which, on a nature less rich than his, might have acted as an inducement to care for people in inverse proportion to their nearness to him. That has sometimes been the result of Stoic cosmopolitanism. Aurelius, however, determined to beautify by all means, great or little, a doctrine which had in it some potential sourness, had brought all the quickness of his intelligence, and long years of observation, to bear on the conditions of social intercourse. He had early determined "not to make business an excuse to decline the offices of humanity—not to pretend to be too much occupied with important affairs to concede what life with others may hourly demand ; ” and with such success, that, in an age which made much of the finer points of that intercourse, it was felt that the mere honesty of his conversation was more pleasing than other men’s flattery. His agreeableness to his young visitor to-day was, in truth, a blossom of the same wisdom which had made of Lucius Verus really a brother—the wisdom of not being exigent with men, any more than with fruit-trees (it is his own favorite figure) beyond their nature : and there was another person, still nearer to him regarding whom this wisdom became a marvel of equity—of charity.

The center of a group of princely children, in the same apartment with Aurelius, with all the refined intimacy of a modern home, sat the empress Faustina, warming her hands over a fire. With her long fingers lighted up red by the glowing coals of the brazier, Marius looked close upon the most beautiful woman in the world, who was also the great paradox of the age, among her boys and girls. As has been truly said of the numerous representations of her in art, so in life, she had the air of one restless to enter into conversation with the first comer. She had certainly the power of stimulating a very ambiguous sort of curiosity about herself. And Marius found this enigmatic point in her expression, that even after seeing her many times he could never precisely recall her features in absence. The lad of six years, but looking older, who stood beside her, impatiently plucking a rose to pieces over the hearth, was, in outward appearance, his father—the young Verissimus—over again ; but with a certain feminine length of feature, and with all his mother's alertness, or license, of gaze.

Yet rumor knocked at every door and window of the imperial house regarding the adulterers who knocked at them, or quietly left their lovers' garlands there. Was not that likeness of the husband, in the boy beside her, really the effect of a shameful magic, in which a bath of the blood of the murdered gladiator, his true father, had been an ingredient ? Were the tricks for deceiving husbands which the Roman poet describes, really hers, and her household an efficient school of all the arts of furtive love ? Or, was the husband too aware, like every one besides ? Were certain sudden deaths which happened there, really the work of apoplexy, or the plague ?

The man whose ears, whose soul, those rumors were meant to penetrate, was however faithful to his sanguine and optimist philosophy, to his determination that the world should be to him simply as the higher reason preferred to conceive it ; and the life's journey Aurelius had made so far, though involving much moral and intellectual loneliness, had been ever in affectionate and helpful contact with other wayfarers, very unlike himself. From the days of his earliest childhood in the Lateran gardens, he seemed to himself, blessing the gods for it after a deliberate survey, to have been always surrounded by relatives, friends, and servants, of exceptional virtue. From the great Stoic idea, that all men are fellow-citizens of one city, he had derived a tenderer, more equitable estimate than is common among Stoics, of men's and women's eternal shortcomings. Considerations that might tend to the sweetening of his temper it was his daily care to store away, with a kind of philosophic pride in the thought that no one took more good-naturedly than he the "oversights" of his neighbors. For had not Plato taught (it was not paradox, but simple truth of experience) that if people sin, it is because they know no better, and are "under the necessity of their own ignorance." Hard to himself, he seemed at times to decline too softly upon unworthy people. Really, he came thereby upon many a useful instrument; and, as regards the empress Faustina, he would seem at least to have kept her, by a constraining affection, from becoming all that most people have believed her; and certainly won in her (we must take him at his word in the "Thoughts," abundantly confirmed by the letters, on both sides, in his correspondence with Cornelius Fronto) a consolation for himself, the more secure, perhaps, for being misknown of others. Was the secret of her actual blamelessness, after all, with him, who has at last screened her name? At all events, the one thing quite certain about her, besides her extraordinary beauty, is her sweetness to him.

No! The wise, who had made their observations on the trees of the garden, would not expect to gather grapes of thorns or fig-trees: he was the vine, putting forth his genial fruit, by natural law, again and again, after his kind, whatever use people might make of it. Certainly, his actual presence never lost its power, and Faustina was glad in it to-day, the birthday of one of her children, a boy who stood at her knee holding tenderly in his fingers a tiny silver trumpet, one of his birthday gifts. "I, for my part, unless I conceive my hurt as such, have no hurt at all"—boasts the would-be apathetic emperor—"and how I care to conceive of the thing rests with me." Yet when his children fall sick or die, this pretence breaks down; and he is broken-hearted: and one of the charms of certain of his letters still extant, is his reference to those childish sicknesses—"On my return to Lorium," he writes, "I found my little lady--domnulam meam--in a fever;" and again, in a letter to one of the most serious of men, "You will be glad to hear that our little one is better and running about the room--parvulam nostram melius valere et intra cubiculum discurrere."

The young Commodus had departed from the chamber, anxious to witness the exercises of certain gladiators (his native taste for them being, according to popular rumor, an inheritance from his true father) and to escape from the too staid company of the gravest and sweetest specimen of old age Marius had ever seen, the tutor of the imperial children, who had arrived to offer his birthday congratulations, and now, very familiarly and affectionately, made a part of the group, falling on the shoulders of the emperor, kissing the empress Faustina in the face, the little ones on both face and hands. Marcus Cornelius Fronto, the "Orator," the favorite among the many teachers of the emperor's youth, afterwards his most trusted counsellor, and now the undisputed occupant of the sophistic throne, whose equipage, elegantly mounted with silver, Marius had seen in the streets of Rome, had certainly turned his many personal gifts to account, with a good fortune, remarkable even in that age, so indulgent to professors, or rhetoricians. The gratitude of the emperor Aurelius, always generous to his teachers, arranging even their quarrels sometimes, for they were not always fair to each other, had helped him to a really great place in the world. But his sumptuous appendages, including the villa and gardens of Mæcenas, had been borne with an air perfectly becoming, by the professor of a philosophy which, even in its most accomplished and elegant phase, included a gentle contempt for such things. With an intimate practical knowledge of manners, physiognomies, smiles, disguises, flatteries, and courtly tricks of every kind—a whole accomplished rhetoric of daily life—he commanded them all for purposes of humanity, and above all of family affection. Through a long life of now eighty years, he had been, as it were, surrounded by the gracious and soothing air of his own eloquence—the fame, the echoes of it—like warbling birds, or murmuring bees. Setting forth in that, the best ideas of matured pagan philosophy, he had become a favorite "director" of noble youth.

Yes! it was the one instance Marius, always eagerly on the look-out for such, had yet seen of a perfectly tolerable, perfectly beautiful, old age—of an old age in which there seemed, to one who perhaps habitually overvalued the expression of youth, nothing to be regretted, nothing really lost, in what years had taken away. The wise old man, whose blue eyes and fair skin were so delicate, uncontaminate and clear, would seem to have carefully and consciously replaced each natural trait of youth, as it departed from him, by an equivalent grace of culture; and had the blitheness, the placid cheerfulness, as he had also the infirmity, the claim on stronger people, of a delightful child. And yet he seemed to be but awaiting his exit from life, that moment with which the Stoics were almost as much preoccupied as the Christians, however differently; and set Marius pondering on the contrast between a placidity like that, at eighty years, and the sort of desperateness he was aware of in his own way of entertaining that thought. His infirmities nevertheless had been painful and long-continued, with losses of children and pet grandchildren. What with the crowd, and the wretched streets, it was a sign of affection which had cost him something, for the old man to have left his own house at all that day; and he was glad of the emperor's support, as he moved from place to place among the children he protests so often to have loved as his own.

For a strange piece of literary good fortune, at the beginning of the present century, has set free the long-buried fragrance of this famous friendship of the old world, from below a valueless later manuscript, in a series of letters, wherein the two writers exchange, for the most part their evening thoughts, especially on family anniversaries, and with entire intimacy, on their children, on the art of speech, on all the various subtleties of the "science of images," above all, of course, on sleep and matters of health; full of mutual admiration of each other's eloquence, restless in absence till they see each other again, noting characteristically even their dreams of each other, expecting the day which will terminate the office, or the business or duty, which separates them—"as superstitious people watch for the star, at the rising of which they may break their fast." To one of the writers, to Aurelius, the correspondence was sincerely of value. We see him once reading his letters with genuine delight after retiring to rest. Fronto discourages his pupil from writing in Greek—Why buy, at great cost, a foreign wine, inferior to that from his own vineyard? Aurelius, on the other hand, with an extraordinary, innate susceptibility to words—la parole pour la parole, as the French say—despairs, before Fronto's rhetorical perfections.

Like the modern visitor to the Capitoline and some other museums, Fronto had been struck, pleasantly struck, by the family likeness among the Antonines; and it was part of his friendship to make much of it, in the case of the children of Faustina. "Well! I have seen the little ones," he writes to Aurelius, then, apparently, absent from them—"I have seen the little ones—the pleasantest sight of my life; for they are as like yourself as could possibly be. It has well repaid me for my journey over that slippery road, and up those steep rocks ; for I beheld you, not simply face to face before me, but, more generously, whichever way I turned, to the right or left of me. For the rest, I found them, heaven be thanked ! with healthy cheeks and lusty voices. One was holding a slice of white bread, like a king's son ; the other a crust of brown bread, as becomes the offspring of a philosopher. I pray the gods to have the sower and the seed alike in their keeping ; to watch over this field wherein the ears of corn are so kindly alike. Ah ! I heard too their pretty voices, so sweet that in the childish prattle of one and the other, I seemed somehow to be listening—yes ! in that chirping of your pretty chickens—to the limpid and harmonious notes of your own oratory. Take care ! you will find me growing independent, having those I could love in your place—love, on the surety of my eyes and ears.”

“Magistro meo salutem,” answers the father, “I too have seen my little ones in your sight of them ; as, also, I saw yourself in reading your letter. It is that charming letter that forces me to write thus.”—With reiterations of affection, that is, which are continual in these letters, on both sides, and which may strike a modern reader, either as fulsome ; or, perhaps, as having something in common with the old Judaic unction of friendship ; but which were certainly sincere.

It was to one of those children that Fronto had now brought the birthday gift of the silver trumpet, upon which he ventured to blow softly now and again, turning away with delighted eyes at the sound, when he thought the old man was not listening. It was the well-worn, valetudinarian subject of sleep, on which Fronto and Aurelius were talking together; Aurelius always feeling it a burden, Fronto a thing of magic capacities, so that he had written an encomium in its praise, and often by ingenious arguments recommends his imperial pupil not to stint it. To-day, with his younger listeners in mind, he had a story to tell about it:—

“They say that our father Jupiter, when he ordered the world at the beginning, divided time into two parts exactly equal; the one part he clothed with light, the other with darkness; he called them Day and Night; and he assigned rest to the night and to day the work of life. At that time Sleep was not yet born and men passed the whole of their lives awake: only, the quiet of the night was ordained for them, instead of sleep. But it came to pass, little by little, being that the minds of men are restless, that they carried on their business alike by night as by day, and gave no part at all to repose.

And Jupiter, when he perceived that even in the night-time they ceased not from trouble and disputation, and that even the courts of law remained open (it was the pride of Marcus, as Fronto knew, to preside in such courts till far into the night), resolved to appoint one of his brothers to be the overseer of the night and have authority over man's rest. But Neptune pleaded in excuse the gravity of his constant charge of the seas, and Father Dis the difficulty of keeping in subjection the spirits below : and Jupiter, having taken counsel with the other gods, perceived that the practice of nightly vigils was somewhat in favor. It was by night, for the most part, that Juno gave birth to her children ; Minerva, the mistress of all art and craft, loved the midnight lamp ; Mars delighted in the night for his plots and sallies ; and the favor of Venus and Bacchus was with those who roused by night. Then it was that Jupiter formed the design of creating Sleep ; and he added him to the number of the gods, and gave him the charge over night and rest, putting into his hands the keys of human eyes. With his own hands he mingled the juices wherewith Sleep should soothe the hearts of mortals—herb of Enjoyment and herb of Safety, gathered from a grove in Heaven ; and, from the meadows of Acheron, the herb of Death ; expressing from it one single drop only, no bigger than a tear that one might hide. ‘ With this juice,’ he said, ‘ pour slumber upon the eyelids of mortals. So soon as it hath touched them they will lay themselves down motionless, under thy power. But be not afraid : they will revive, and in a while stand up again upon their feet.’ After that, Jupiter gave wings to Sleep, attached, not to his heels, like Mercury’s, but to his shoulders, like the wings of Love. For he said, ‘ It becomes thee not to approach men’s eyes as with the noise of a chariot, and the rushing of a swift courser, but with placid and merciful flight, as upon the wings of a swallow—nay ! not so much as with the fluttering of a dove.’ Besides all this, that he might be yet pleasanter to men, he committed to him also a multitude of blissful dreams, according to every man’s desire. One watched his favorite actor ; another listened to the flute, or guided a charioteer in the race : in his dream, the soldier was victorious, the general was carried in triumph, the wanderer returned home. Yes!—and sometimes those dreams come true!”

Just then Aurelius was summoned to make the birthday offerings to his household gods. A heavy tapestry was drawn back ; and, beyond it, Marius gazed for a few moments into the Lararium, or imperial chapel. A noble youth, in a white habit, was in waiting, with the little chest in his hand containing incense for the use of the altar. On richly carved consoles, or sideboards, around this narrow chamber, were arranged the rich apparatus of worship and the golden or gilded images, adorned to-day with the freshest flowers—among them that image of Fortune, which had come from the apartment of Antoninus Pius—and those of the emperor’s own teachers who had gone to their rest. A dim fresco on the wall commemorated the ancient piety of Lucius Albinus, who escaping from Rome after a great disaster and overtaking certain priests on foot, with their sacred utensils, descended from the wagon in which he rode and yielded it to the ministers of the gods. It was just as he passed into the chapel that the emperor paused, and with a grave but friendly look at his young visitor, delivered a parting sentence, audible to him only : Imitation is the most acceptable part of worship ; and the gods had much rather mankind should resemble than flatter them—Make sure that those to whom you come nearest be the happier, at least, by your presence !

It was the very spirit of the scene and the hour—the hour Marius had spent in the imperial house. How temperate, how tranquilizing ! what humanity ! —Yet, as he left the eminent company, concerning whose way of life at home he had been so youthfully curious, and sought, after his manner, to determine the main trait in all that ; he had to confess that it was a sentiment of mediocrity, though of a mediocrity, for once, really golden.

CHAPTER XIV.

MANLY AMUSEMENT.

DURING the Eastern war there had been a moment when a schism in the empire seemed possible through the defection of Lucius Verus; when to Aurelius it had seemed also possible to confirm his allegiance by no less a gift than his beautiful daughter Lucilla, the eldest of his children—the domnula, probably, of those letters. The little lady, grown now to strong and stately maidenhood, had been ever something of the good genius, the better soul, to Lucius Verus, by the law of contraries; her somewhat cold and apathetic modesty acting as counterfoil to the young man's tigrish fervor; and she had gone out to him at Ephesus and become his wife by the form of civil marriage, the more solemn wedding rites being deferred till the return of the bride and bridegroom to Rome.

The ceremony of the Confarreation, or religious marriage, in which the bride and bridegroom partook of a certain mystic bread together, accordingly took place with due pomp, early in the spring; Aurelius himself assisting, with much domestic feeling. A crowd of fashionable people filled the space before the entrance to the apartments of Lucius, richly adorned to-day with carpets and flowers, on the Palatine hill, commenting, not always quite delicately, upon the various details of the rite, which only a favored few succeeded in actually witnessing. "She is coming!" Marius could hear them say, "escorted by her young brothers. It is the young Commodus who carries the torch of white-thorn-wood and her little basket of work-things, with the toys for the children"—and then, after a watchful pause, "She is winding the woolen thread round the doorposts—Ah! I see the marriage-cake: the bridegroom presents the fire and water"—Then, in a longer pause, was heard the chorus, Thalassie! Thalassie! and just for a few moments, in the strange light of many wax tapers at noonday, Marius could see them both, bride and bridegroom, side by side, while the bride was lifted over the doorstep—Lucius Verus heated and handsome; the pale, impassive Lucilla looking very long and slender, in her closely folded yellow veil, and high nuptial crown.

As Marius turned away, glad to escape from the pressure of the crowd, he found himself face to face with Cornelius, an infrequent spectator on occasions such as this. It was a relief to depart with him—so fresh and quiet he looked, though in all his splendid equestrian array in honor of the ceremony—from the garish heat of the scene of the marriage. The reserve which had puzzled Marius so much on that first day in Rome, was an instance of many, to him unaccountable, avoidances of things and persons, which certainly meant that an intimate companionship might cost him something in the way of seemingly indifferent amusements and experiences. Some inward standard, Marius seemed to detect there (though wholly unable to estimate it) of distinction, selection, refusal, amid the various elements of the fervid and corrupt life across which they were moving together,—some secret, constraining motive, ever on the alert at eye and ear, which carried him through Rome as under a charm, so that Marius could not but think of that figure of the white bird in the market-place as certainly made true of him. And Marius was still full of admiration for this companion, who had known also how to make himself very pleasant to him. Here was the clear, cold corrective which the fever of his present life demanded. Without that, he would have felt alternately suffocated and exhausted by an existence, at once so gaudy and overdone, and yet so intolerably empty; in which people, at their best, seemed only to be brooding, like the wise emperor himself, over a world's disillusion. For with all the severity of Cornelius, there was such a breeze of hopefulness—freshness and hopefulness, as of new morning—about him. For the most part, as I said, those reserves and refusals of his seemed unaccountable. But there were some cases where the unknown monitor acted in a direction with which the judgment, or instinct, of Marius wholly concurred; though still further reinforced by the effective decision of Cornelius, as by a kind of outwardly-embodied conscience. And the entire drift of his education determined him, on one point at least, to be wholly of one mind with this peculiar friend (they two, it might be, together, against the world!) when, alone of a whole company of brilliant youth, he had withdrawn from his appointed place in the amphitheater, at a grand public show, which after an interval of many months, was presented there, in honor of the nuptials of Lucius Verus and Lucilla.

And it was still to the eye, through visible movement and aspect, that the character, or genius of Cornelius made itself felt by Marius; as on that afternoon when he had girt on his armor, among the expressive lights and shades of the dim old villa at the roadside, and every object of his knightly array had seemed like the indication or sign of something far beyond itself. Consistently with his really poetic temper, things reached Marius, even more exclusively than he was aware, through sensuous media. From Flavian, in that brief early summer of his existence, he had derived a powerful impression of the "perpetual flux;" he had caught there, as in cipher or symbol, or low whispers more effective than any definite language, his Cyrenaic philosophy, presented thus for the first time, in an image or person, with much beauty and attractiveness, and touched also, in this way, with a pathetic sense of personal sorrow—a concrete image, the abstract equivalent of which he discovered afterwards, when that agitating personal influence had settled down for him, clearly enough, into a theory of practice.—Of what possible intellectual formula could this mystic Cornelius be the sensible exponent; seeming as he did, to live ever in close relationship with, and recognition of, a mental view, a source of discernment, a light upon his way, which had certainly not as yet sprung up for Marius? Meantime the discretion of Cornelius, his energetic clearness and purity, were a charm, rather physical than moral; or at least his exquisite correctness of spirit accorded so perfectly with the regular beauty of his person, as to seem to depend upon it. And, wholly different as was this later friendship, with its warning and exigent restraints, from that old feverish attachment of Flavian, which had made him, at times, like an uneasy slave; still, like that, it was a reconcilment to the world of sense, the visible world. From the hopefulness of that gracious presence, the visible things around him, even the common objects of everyday life—if they but stood together to warm their hands at the same fire—took for him a new poetry, a delicate, fresh bloom, and interest. It was as if his bodily eyes had been indeed mystically washed, renewed, strengthened.

And how eagerly, with what a light heart, would Flavian have taken his place in the amphitheater, among the youth of his own age! with what an appetite for every detail of the entertainment, and its various accessories—the sunshine, filtered into soft gold by the vela, with their serpentine patterning, spread over the more select part of the company—the Vestal virgins, taking their privilege of seats near the empress Faustina, who sat there in a maze of double-colored gems, changing, as she moved, like the waves of the sea—the cool circle of shadow, in which the wonderful toilets of the beau monde told so effectively around the blazing arena, recovered, at intervals during the many hours' show with clean sand for absorbing certain great red patches there, by troops of white-shirted boys, for whom the good-natured audience provided a scramble of nuts and small coin, flung to them over a trellis-work of amber and silver gilt, the precious gift of Nero; while a rain of flowers and perfume fell over themselves, as they paused, between the parts of their long feast upon animal suffering.

During his sojourn at Ephesus, Lucius Verus had readily become a patron, or protégé, of the great goddess of Ephesus, the goddess of hunters; and the show, celebrated by way of a compliment to him to-day, was to present some incidents of her story, in which she figures almost as the genius of madness in animals, or in the humanity which comes in contact with them. The spectacle would have an element of old Greek revival in it, welcome to the taste of a learned and Hellenizing society; and, as Lucius Verus was in some sense a lover of animals, was to be a show of animals, mainly. There would be real wild and domestic creatures, all of rare species; and a real slaughter. On so happy an occasion, the elder emperor might even concede a point, and a living criminal fall into the jaws of the wild beasts. And the entire spectacle was, certainly, to end in the destruction, by one mighty shower of arrows, of a hundred lions, “nobly” provided by Aurelius himself for the amusement of his people—tam magnanimus fuit!

The arena, disposed and decked for the first scene, looked delightfully fresh, reinforcing on the spirits of the audience the actual freshness of the morning, which at that season still brought the dew. Along the subterranean ways which led up to it, the sound of an advancing chorus was at last heard, chanting the words of a sacred Song, or Hymn to Diana: for, after all, the spectacle of the amphitheater was still a religious occasion; its bloodshed having, in a manner, a sacrificial character, tending conveniently to soothe the humane sensibilities of so religious an emperor as Aurelius, who, in his fraternal complacency, had consented to preside over the shows.

Artemis—Diana—as she may be understood in the actual development of her worship, was, indeed, the symbolical expression of two allied yet contrasted elements of human temper and experience—man's amity, and also his enmity, towards the wild creatures, when they were still, in a sense, his brothers. She is the complete and highly complex representative of a state, in which man was still much occupied with animals; not as his flock, nor as his servants (after the pastoral relationship of our later orderly world) but more as his equals, on friendly terms, or the reverse—a state full of primeval sympathies and antipathies, of rivalries and common wants; while he watched, and entered into, the humors of those "younger brothers," with an intimacy, the survivals of which in a later age seem often to have had a kind of madness about them. Diana represents the bright and dark sides of that relationship. But the humanities of it were all forgotten to-day in the excitement of a show, in which mere cruelty to animals, their useless suffering and death, formed the main point of interest. The people watched their destruction, batch after batch, in a not particularly inventive fashion; though it was hoped that the animals themselves, as living creatures are apt to do when hard put to it, would become inventive, and make up, by the fantastic accidents of their agony, for the deficiencies of an age fallen behind in this matter of manly amusement. It was as a Deity of Slaughter—the Taurian goddess, who requires the sacrifice of shipwrecked sailors, thrown on her coasts—the cruel, moonstruck huntress, who brings not only sudden death, but rabies, among the wild creatures, that Diana was to be presented in the person of a famous courtesan. The aim at an actual theatrical illusion, after the first introductory scene, was frankly surrendered to the display of the animals, artificially stimulated and maddened to attack each other. And as Diana was also a special protectress of new-born creatures, there would be an interest in the dexterously contrived escape of the young from their mothers' torn bosoms; as many pregnant animals as possible being carefully selected for the show.

The time had been, and was to come again, when the pleasures of the amphitheater centered in a similar practical joking upon human beings. What more ingenious diversion had stage-manager ever contrived than that incident, itself a practical epi-gram never to be forgotten, when a criminal, who, like slaves and animals, had no rights, was compelled to present the part of Icarus; and, the wings failing him in due course, had fallen among a crowd of hungry bears. For the long shows of the amphitheater were, so to speak, the novel-reading of that age—the current help provided for sluggish imaginations, in the matter of grisly accidents such as might happen to oneself; but with every facility for comfortable inspection. Scævola might watch his own hand consuming in the fire, in the person of a criminal, willing to redeem his life by an act so delightful to the eyes, the very ears, of a curious public. If the part of Marsyas was called for, there was a criminal condemned to lose his skin. It might be almost edifying to study minutely the expression of his face, while the assistants corded and pegged him to the bench, cunningly; the servant of the law waiting by, who, after one short cut with his knife, would slip the man's leg from his skin, as neatly as as if it were a stocking—a finesse in providing a due amount of suffering for criminals, only brought to its height in Nero's living torches. But then, by making his suffering ridiculous, you enlist against the sufferer, much real, and all would-be manliness, and do much to stifle any false sentiment of compassion. The philosophic emperor, having no great taste for sport, and asserting here a personal scruple, had greatly changed all that; had provided that nets should be spread under the dancers on the tight-rope, and buttons for the swords of the gladiators. But the gladiators were still there. Their bloody contests had, under the form of a popular amusement, the efficacy of a human sacrifice: as the whole system of the public shows was understood to have a religious import. Just at this point, certainly the judgment of Lucretius on pagan religion is without reproach—

Tantum religio potuit suadere malorum.

And Marius, weary and indignant, feeling isolated in the great slaughter-house, could not but take notice that Aurelius, in his habitual complaisance to Lucius Verus, who lounged beside him, shouting his applause from time to time, had sat impassively through all the hours Marius himself had remained there; for the most part, indeed, actually averting his eyes from the show, reading, or writing on matters of public business; yet, after all, indifferent. He was revolving, perhaps, that old Stoic paradox of the imperceptibility of pain: which might serve as an excuse, should those savage popular humors ever again turn against men and women. Marius remembered well his very attitude and expression on this day, when, a few years later, certain things came to pass in Gaul, under his full authority: and that attitude and expression defined already, even thus early in their so friendly intercourse, and though he was still full of gratitude for his interest, a permanent point of difference between the emperor and himself—between himself, and all the convictions of his life, taking center to-day in his merciful, angry heart ; and Aurelius, as representing all the light, all the apprehensive power there might be in pagan intellect. There was something in a tolerance like that, in the bare fact that Aurelius could sit patiently through a scene like that, which seemed to Marius to mark him as eternally his inferior on the question of righteousness ; to set them on opposite sides, in some great conflict, of which this difference was but one presentment. Due, in whatever proportions, to the abstract principles he had formulated for himself, or in spite of them, there was the loyal conscience in him, deciding, judging himself and every one else, with a wonderful sort of authority—You ought, methinks, to be something quite different from that you are ; here, and here ! Certainly, Aurelius was lacking in that decisive conscience on sight, of the intimations of which Marius could entertain no doubt—which he demanded in others. He at least, the humble follower of the eye, was aware of a crisis in life—in that brief obscure existence—a fierce opposition of real good and real evil, around him ; the issues of which he must by no means compromise or confuse ; but of the antagonisms of which the wise man was, certainly, unaware.

The long chapter of the cruelty of the Roman public shows may, perhaps, have for its first result upon us a feeling of self-complacency. Yet it might be well to ask ourselves—it is always well to do that, when we read of the slave-trade, for instance.

or of great religious persecutions, on this side or on that, or of anything else which raises in us the question, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this?"—not merely, what germs of feeling we may possess, which, under fitting circumstances, might induce us to the like; but, even more practically, what thoughts, what sort of considerations, our minds may actually entertain, which would have furnished us, had we lived in another age, and in the midst of those legal crimes, with a plausible excusing of them: each age, perhaps, having its great point of blindness, with its consequent great sin—the touch-stone in it of a never-failing conscience in the select few.

Those cruel amusements were, certainly, the sin of blindness, of deadness and stupidity, in the age of Marius; and his light had not failed him regarding it. Yes! what was wanting was the heart that would make it impossible to witness all this; and the future would be with the forces that could beget a heart like that. His favorite philosophy had said, Trust the eye: Strive to be right always, regarding the concrete experience: Never falsify your impressions. And its sanction had been at least effective here, in saying, It is what I may not see!—Surely, evil was a real thing; and the wise man wanting in the sense of it, where not to have been, by instinctive election, on the right side, was to have failed in life.

PART THE THIRD.

CHAPTER XV.

STOICISM AT COURT.

THE very finest flower of the same company—Aurelius with the gilt fascēs borne before him, a crowd of exquisites, the empress Faustina herself, and all the elegant blue-stockings of the day, who maintained, it was said, their own private sophists to whisper philosophy into their ears as they made their toilets—was assembled again a few months later, in a different place and for a very different purpose. The temple of Peace, a foundation of Hadrian's, enlarged by a library and lecture-rooms, had grown into an institution resembling something between a college and a literary club; and here Cornelius Fronto was to deliver a discourse on the Nature of Morals. There were some, indeed, who had desired the emperor Aurelius himself to declare his whole mind on this matter. Rhetoric had become almost a function of the state. Philosophy was upon the throne; and had from time to time, by request, delivered an official utterance with well-nigh divine authority. And it was as the delegate of this authority, under the full sanction of the philosopher pontiff, that the aged Fronto purposed to-day to expound some parts of the Stoic doctrine, with the view of recommending morals and making them acceptable to that refined but perhaps prejudiced company, as being, in effect, one mode of comeliness in things—a fair order, and, as it were, a kind of music in life. And he did this earnestly, with an outlay of all his science of mind, and that eloquence of which he was known to be a master. For Stoicism was no longer a rude and unkempt thing. Received at court, it had largely decorated itself: it had become persuasive and insinuating, and sought not only to convince men's intelligences but to allure their souls. Associated with that fair old age of the great rhetorician and his winning voice, it was almost Epicurean. And the old man was at his best on the occasion; the last on which he ever appeared in this way. To-day was his own birthday. Early in the morning the imperial letter of congratulation had reached him; and all the pleasant animation it had caused was in his face, as assisted by his daughter Gratia, he took his place on the ivory chair, as president of the Athenæum of Rome, wearing with a wonderful grace the philosophic pall—in reality, nothing else than the loose woolen cloak of the common soldier, but fastened on his right shoulder with a magnificent clasp, the emperor's birthday gift.

It was an age, as sufficient evidence shows, whose delight in rhetoric was but one element of a general susceptibility; an age not merely taking pleasure in words, but experiencing a great moral power in them:

and Fronto's quaintly fashionable audience would have wept, and also assisted with their purses, had his purpose to-day been, as sometimes happened, the recommendation of some object of charity. As it was, arranging themselves at their ease among the images and flowers, these amateurs of beautiful language, with their tablets for noting carefully all the orator's most exquisite expressions, were ready to give themselves wholly to the intellectual treat prepared for them; applauding, blowing loud kisses through the air sometimes, at the speaker's triumphant exit from one of his long, skilfully modulated sentences; while the younger of them meant to imitate everything about him, down to the inflections of his voice and the very folds of his mantle. Certainly there was rhetoric enough for them—a wealth of imagery; illustrations from painting, music, mythology, the experiences of love; a management, by which subtle, unexpected meaning was brought out of familiar words, like flies from morsels of amber, to use Fronto's own figure. But with all its richness, the higher claim of Fronto's style was rightly understood to lie in gravity and self-command, and an especial care for the purity of a vocabulary which rejected every term and phrase not stamped with the authority of the most approved ancient models.

And it happened with Marius, as it will sometimes happen, that this general discourse to a general audience had the effect of an utterance dexterously designed for him. With a conscience still vibrating forcibly under the shock of that day in the amphitheater, and full of the ethical charm of the character of his friend Cornelius, as he conceived it, he was questioning himself with much impatience, as to the possibility of an adjustment between his own elaborately thought-out intellectual scheme and the old morality ; which, as such, had as yet found no place in it, inasmuch as that old morality seemed to demand the concession of certain first principles which might misdirect or retard him in the effort towards a complete, many-sided existence ; or distort the revelations of the experience of life ; or curtail his natural liberty of heart and mind. And yet there was the taint of a possible antinomianism there ; of which (his imagination being filled just then with the noble and resolute air, the gayety almost, which composed the outward mien and presentment of his friend's inflexible ethics) he felt a nascent jealousy, as being, to say the least, a kind of slur upon his taste, wounding that intellectual pride to which it was one peculiarity of his philosophic scheme to allow so much. And it was precisely such a moral situation as this that Fronto appeared to be contemplating. He seemed to have before his mind the case of one—Cyrenaic or Epicurean, as the courtier tends to be, by habit and instinct, if not on principle—who yet experiences, actually, a strong tendency to moral assents, and a desire, with as little logical inconsistency as may be, to find a place for duty and righteousness, in his house of thought.

And the Stoic professor found the key to this problem in the purely æsthetic beauty of the old morality, as a prevailing actual system in things, fascinating to the imagination—to taste in its most developed form—through association; a system or order, as a matter of fact in possession, not only of the great world, but of the rare minority of élite intelligences; from which, therefore, least of all would the sort of Epicurean he was contemplating endure to be, so to speak, an outlaw. He supposed his hearer to be sincerely in search of a practical principle (and it was here that he seemed to Marius to be speaking straight to him) which might give unity of motive to an actual rectitude of life—a probity and cleanness of life, in fact—determined partly by purely natural affection, partly by an enlightened self-interest, or the feeling of honor; due in part even to the mere fear of penalties: no element of which, however, was distinctively moral, as such, in the agent; and affording, therefore, no common ground of sympathy with a really ethical being like Cornelius, or even like the philosophic emperor. Performing the same offices; actually satisfying, even as they, the external claims of others; rendering to all their dues—a person thus circumstanced would be wanting, nevertheless, in a principle of inward adjustment to the moral beings around him. How tenderly—more tenderly than many stricter souls—might such an one yield himself to kindly instinct! what a fineness of charity in passing judgment on others! what an exquisite conscience of other men's susceptibilities! He knows for how much the manner, because the heart itself, counts, in doing a kindness. He goes beyond most people in his care for all weakly creatures; judging, instinctively, that to be but sentient is to possess rights. He conceives a hundred duties, though he may not call them by that name, of the existence of which purely duteous souls may have no suspicion. He has a kind of pride in doing more than they, in a way of his own. Sometimes, he may think that those men of line and rule do not really understand their own business. How narrow, inflexible, unintelligent!—what poor guardians, he may reason, of the inward spirit of righteousness—are some supposed careful walkers according to its letter and form! And still, all the while, he allows no moral world as such; real though it be to Æschylus, to Socrates, to Virgil; as also to a thousand commonplace souls.

But over and above these practical rectitudes, thus determined by natural affection or self-love or fear, he may notice that there is a remnant of right conduct—what he does, still more what he abstains from doing—not so much through his own free election, as from a deference, an “assent,” entire, habitual, unconscious, to custom—to the actual habit or fashion of others, from whom he could not endure to break away, any more than he would care to be out of agreement with them in questions of mere manner, or, say, even, of dress. Yes! there were the evils, the vices, which he avoided as, essentially, a soil. An assent, such as this, to the preferences of others might seem to be the weakest of motives, and the rectitude it could determine the least considerable element in moral life. Yet here, according to Fronto, was in truth the revealing example, albeit operating upon comparative trifles, of the general principle required. There was one great idea (Fronto proceeded to expound the idea of humanity—of a universal commonwealth of minds—which yet somehow becomes conscious, and as if incarnate, in a select body of just men made perfect) in association with which the determination to conform to precedent was elevated into the weightiest, the fullest, the clearest principle of moral action ; a principle under which one might subsume men's most strenuous efforts after righteousness.

‘Ο κόσμος ὡσανεὶ πόλις ἔστιν—the world is as it were a commonwealth, a city : and there are observances, customs, usages actually current in it—things our friends and companions will expect of us, as the condition of our living there with them at all, as really their peers, or fellow-citizens. Those observances were, indeed, the creation of a visible or invisible aristocracy in it, whose actual manners, whose preferences from of old, become now a weighty tradition as to the way in which things should be or not be done, are like a music, to which the intercourse of life proceeds—such a music as no one who had once caught its harmonies would willingly jar. In his way, the becoming, as the Greeks—or manners, as both Greeks and Romans said, would indeed be a comprehensive term for duty. Righteousness would be, in the words of the Cæsar himself, but the “following of the reasonable will and ordinance of the oldest, the most venerable, of all cities and polities—the reasonable will of the royal, the law-giving element in it—forasmuch as we are citizens in that supreme city on high, of which all other cities beside are but as single habitations.” But as the old man spoke with animation of this supreme city, this invisible society, whose conscience had become explicit in its inner circle of inspired souls; of whose common, pervading spirit, the trusted leaders of human conscience had been but the mouthpiece, and of whose successive personal preferences in the conduct of life, the old morality was the sum,—Marius, who had been so jealous of the claims of that old morality, felt that his own thoughts were passing beyond the actual intention of the speaker; not in the direction of any clearer theoretic and abstract definition of that ideal commonwealth, but rather as if in search of its visible locality and abiding-place, the towers of which, so to speak, he might see and count, according to his own old, natural habit of mind. It would be the fabric, the outward fabric, of a system reaching, certainly, far beyond the great city around him, even if conceived in all the machinery of its visible and invisible influences at their grandest—as Augustus or Trajan might have conceived of them—however well that visible Rome might pass for a figure of this new, unseen Rome on high. At moments, Marius even asked himself with surprise, whether it could be some vast secret society, to which Fronto referred?—that august community, to be an outlaw from which, to be foreign to the manners of which, was a loss so much greater than to be excluded, into the ends of the earth, from the sovereign Roman commonwealth. Humanity, a universal order, the great polity, its aristocracy of elect spirits, the mastery of their example over their successors—these were the stimulating ideas, the abstract intellectual conceptions, by association with which the Stoic professor had tried to elevate, and unite under a single principle, men's moral efforts, himself lifted up with so real an enthusiasm. But where should Marius search for all that, as more than an intellectual abstraction? Where were those elect souls in whom the claim of humanity became so amiable, winning, persuasive—whose footsteps through the world were so beautiful in the actual order he saw; whose faces averted from him, would be more than he could bear? Where was that comely order, to which as a great fact of experience he must give its due; to which, as to all other beautiful "phenomena," in life, he must, for his own peace, adjust and relate himself?

Rome did well to be serious. Fronto's discourse ended somewhat abruptly, as the noise of a great crowd in motion was heard below the walls; whereupon, the audience, following the humor of its more youthful element, poured itself into the colonnade, from the steps of which Marius saw the famous procession, or transvectio of the military knights, passing over the Forum, from their trysting-place at the temple of Mars, to the temple of the Dioscuri. It was taking place this year, not on the day accustomed—anniversary of the victory of the Lake Regillus, with its pair of celestial assistants—and amid the heat and roses of a Roman July; but, by anticipation, some months earlier; the almond-trees along the way being still in leafless flower. Behind their light trellis-work, Marius watched the riders, arrayed in all their gleaming ornaments, and wearing chaplets of olive round their casques; the faces below, which, what with plague and battle, were nearly all youthful. It was a flowery scene enough; but had to-day its fulness of war-like meaning; the return of the army to the north, where the enemy was again upon the move, being imminent. Cornelius had ridden along in his place; and, on the dismissal of the company, passed below the steps where Marius stood, with that new song which he had heard once before floating from his lips.

CHAPTER XVI.

SECOND THOUGHTS.

AND Marius, for his part, was grave enough. From to's discourse, with its wide prospect over the human, the spiritual, horizon, had set him on a review—on a review of the isolating narrowness, in particular, of his own theoretic scheme. Long after even the roses had faded, when “the town” had departed to country villas or the baths or the war, he remained behind in Rome; anxious to try the last-ingness of his own Epicurean rose-garden: setting to work over again, and deliberately passing from point to point of that old argument with himself, down to its practical conclusions. That age and our own have much in common—many difficulties and hopes. Let the reader pardon me if here and there I seem to be passing from Marius to his modern representatives—from Rome, to Paris or London.

What really were its claims as a theory of feeling and practice? It had been a theory, avowedly, of loss and gain, so to call it—of an economy: and if it missed something in the commerce of life, which some other theory of feeling and practice found it self able to save, if it made a needless sacrifice, then, it must be in manner inconsistent with itself, and lack theoretic completeness. Did it make such a sacrifice? What did it lose?

And we may note, as Marius could hardly have done, that that new Cyrenaicism of his is ever the characteristic philosophy of youth--ardent, but narrow in its survey; sincere, but apt to be one-sided, and even fanatical. It is one of those subjective and partial ideals, based on vivid, because limited, apprehension of the truth of one aspect of experience--in this case, of the beauty of the world and the brevity of man's life in it--of which it may be said, that it is the special vocation of the young to express them. In the school of Cyrene, in that comparatively fresh Greek world, we may think we see that philosophy where it is least blasé, as we say; in its most pleasant, its blithest, and yet perhaps its wisest form, youthfully bright in the youth of European thought. But it grows young again for a while in almost every youthful soul. We hear it spoken of sometimes, as the appropriate utterance of jaded men; but in them it can hardly be sincere, or, by the nature of the case, an enthusiasm. "Walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes," is, indeed, most often, according to the supposition of the book from which I quote it, the counsel of the young, who feel that the sunshine is pleasant along their veins, and wintry weather, though in a general way foreseen, a long way off. The youthful enthusiasm or fanaticism, the self-abandonment to one favorite school or phase, of thought or taste, which occurs, quite naturally, at the outset of every really vigorous intellectual career, finds its special opportunity in a theory such as that so carefully put together by Marius, just because it seems to call on one to make the sacrifice, accompanied by a vivid sensation of power and will, of what others value—the sacrifice of some conviction, or doctrine, or supposed first principle—for the sake of that clear-eyed intellectual integrity or consistency, which is like spotless bodily cleanliness and nicety, or scrupulous personal honor ; and which has for the mind of the youthful student, when he first comes to appreciate it, itself the fascination of an ideal.

The Cyrenaic doctrine, then, realized as a motive of earnestness or enthusiasm, is not so properly the utterance of the “jaded Epicurean,” as of the strong young man in all the freshness of his thought and feeling, fascinated by the notion of at least lifting up his life to the level of some bold, adventurous theory ; while, in the first genial heat of existence, physical objects, also fair and strong, beat potently upon his unwearied and widely opened senses. He discovers a great new poem every spring, with a hundred thoughts and feelings never expressed, or at least never expressed so well, before. The workshops of the artists, who can select and set before one what is really most distinguished in visible life, are open to him. He thinks that the old Platonic, or the new Baconian philosophy, has been better explained than by the authors themselves, or with some striking original development, this very month. In the quiet heat of early summer, on the dusty gold morning, the music comes, louder at intervals, above the hum of voices from some neighboring church, among the almond-trees in blossom ; valued now, perhaps, only for the poetically rapt faces among priests or worshipers, and the mere eloquence and tact of its preachers of righteousness and religion ; for indeed, in his scrupulous idealism, he feels himself to be something of a priest, and that devotion of his days to the contemplation of what is beautiful, a sort of perpetual religious service. Afar off, how many fair cities and delicate sea-coasts await him ! At that age, with minds of a certain constitution, no very choice or exceptional circumstances of life are needed to provoke an enthusiasm something like this. Life in modern London even, in the heavy glow of summer, is stuff sufficient for the fresh imagination of a youth to build its "palace of art" of ; and the very sense and enjoyment of an experience in which all is new, are but enhanced, like that glow of summer itself, by the thought of its brevity ; which gives him something of the gambler's zest, in the apprehension, by dexterous act or diligently appreciative thought, of the highly colored moments which are to pass away so quickly. At bottom, perhaps, in his elaborately developed self-consciousness, his sensibilities, his almost fierce grasp upon the things he values at all, he has, beyond all others, an inward need of something permanent in its character, to hold by : of which circumstance, also, he may be partly aware, and that, as with the brilliant Claudio in "Measure for Measure," it is, in truth, but darkness he is "encountering, like a bride." But the inevitable falling of the curtain is probably a long way off; and in the daylight, at least, it is not often that he really shudders at the thought of the grave—the weight above, and the narrow world and its company, within. When the thought of it does occur to him, he may say to himself—Well! and the monk, for instance, who has renounced all this on the security of some dim world beyond it, really acquiesces in that "fifth act," amid all the consoling ministries around him, as little as I should at this moment; though I may hope, that, as at the real ending of a play, however well acted, I may already have had quite enough of it, and find a true wellbeing in eternal sleep.

And precisely in this circumstance, that, consistently with the function of youth in general, Cyrenaicism will always be more or less the special philosophy, or prophecy, of the young, when the ideal of a rich experience comes to them in the ripeness of their receptive, if not of the reflective, powers—precisely in this circumstance, if we rightly consider it, lies the duly prescribed corrective of that philosophy. For it is by its exclusiveness, and negatively rather than positively, that such theories fail to satisfy us permanently: and what they really need for their correction, is the complementary influence of some greater system, in which they may find their due place. That Sturm und Drang of the spirit, as it has been called, that ardent and special apprehension of half-truths, in the enthusiastic, and as it were prophetic advocacy of which, a devotion to truth, in the case of the young—apprehending but one point at a time in the great circumference—most naturally embodies itself, is leveled down, surely and safely enough, afterwards, as in history so in the individual, by the weakness and mere weariness, as well as by the maturer wisdom, of our nature :—happily ! if the enthusiasm which answered to but one phase of intellectual growth really blends, as it loses its decisiveness, in a larger and commoner morality, with wider though perhaps vaguer hopes. And though truth indeed, lies, as has been said, “in the whole”—in harmonizings and adjustments like this—yet those special apprehensions may still owe their full value, in this sense of “the whole,” to that earlier, one-sided but ardent preoccupation with them.

In the world of old Greek thought, we may notice with some surprise, that, in a little while, the nobler form of Cyrenaicism—Cyrenaicism cured of its faults—met the nobler form of Cynicism halfway. Starting from opposed points, they merged, each in its most refined form, in a single ideal of temperance or moderation ; which again was almost identical with the practical wisdom of Socrates, reflecting in its worthiest form, the conscience of Greece. Something of the same kind may be noticed regarding some later phases of Cyrenaicism. If it starts with a series of considerations opposed to the religious temper, which the religious temper holds it a duty to repress, it is like it, nevertheless, and very unlike any lower development of temper, in its stress and earnestness, its serious application to the pursuit of a very unworldly type of perfection: and it may be thought that the saint, and the Cyrenaic lover of beauty, would at least understand each other better than either would understand the mere man of the world. Stretch them one point further, shift the terms a little, and they might actually touch.

Perhaps all theories of morals tend, as they rise to their best, and as conceived by their worthiest disciples, to identification with each other: the most unlikely neighbors meeting at some point higher than any one of them. For the variety of men's possible reflections on their experience, as of that experience itself, is not really as great as it seems: and as the highest and most disinterested of ethical formulæ, filtering down into men's actual everyday existence, reach the same poor level of vulgar egoism; so, we may fairly suppose that all the highest spirits, from whatever contrasted points they may have started, would yet be found to entertain, in their moral consciousness as actually realized, much the same kind of company; to hold, far more than might be thought probable at first sight, the same personal types of character, and even the same artistic and literary types, in esteem of aversion; and to have, all of them alike, the same savor of unworldliness. Cyrenaicism, then, old or new, may be noticed, just in proportion to the completeness of its development, to approach, as to the nobler form of Cynicism, so also to the more nobly developed phases of the old, or traditional ethics. In the gravity of its conception of life, in its pursuit after nothing less than a perfection, in its apprehension of the value of time—the passion and the seriousness which are like a consecration—la passion et le sérieux qui consacrent—it may be conceived, as regards its main drift, to be not so much opposed to the old morality, as an exaggeration of one special motive in it; it might, with no real misrepresentation, be referred or adjusted to that old morality, as a part to the whole. And if we see this, then comes the question of the value, in all ethical speculation, of common terms—of terms, that is, which bring the narrower, or exceptional ideals and tendencies of character, into connection with those which are larger and more generally typical; which, instead of opposing them, explain the former through the latter. Such terms, or conceptions are important in practical ethics, because they largely decide our manner of receiving experience, and the measure we receive of it. They are like instruments, or points of view, which determine how much, and how truly, we shall reflect of life; they lead our attention to this or that element in it, to this or that capacity in ourselves, in preference to another; and, like some optical contrivances in the sensible world, they may greatly narrow the field of that experience, in their concentration upon some one, single, though perhaps very important interest in it, to which they give a false isolation or relief.

It was some such cramping, narrowing, costly preference of one part of his own nature, and of the nature of things, to another, that Marius seemed to have detected in himself, as also in his old masters in the Cyrenaic philosophy. If they did realize the μονόχρονος ἡδονή, as they said—the pleasure of the ideal now—if certain moments and spaces of their lives were high-pitched, passionately colored, intent with sensation, and a kind of knowledge, which, in its vivid clearness, was like sensation—if, now and then, they apprehended the world in its fulness, and had a vision, almost “beatific,” of ideal personalities in life and art; yet, these moments were a very costly matter: they paid a great price for them, if we duly consider it, in a thousand possible sympathies, and things only to be enjoyed through sympathy, from which they detached themselves, in the mere intellectual pride of loyalty to a theory which would take nothing for granted, and assent to no hypothetical or approximate truths. If metaphysical acumen had cleared away the metaphysical pretension to know what is, that free place might be left for what appears; surely, the attractive aspects of morality and religion, as then popularly understood, might have ranked as at least φαντασίαι—observable, perhaps amiable, appearances—among the rest. The Greek religion was then alive: then, even more than in its later day of dissolution, the higher view of it was possible, even for the philosopher. Its story made little or no demand for a reasoned or formal intellectual acceptance. A religion, which had grown through and through man's life, so strongly and quietly; which had meant so much for so many generations; expressing so much of their hopes, in forms so lovely and so familiar; a tradition so tranquilizing, linked by such complex associations to man as he had been, and was—a religion like this, one would think, might have had its uses, even for a philosophic skeptic; without embarrassing him by any doubtful theory of its intellectual groundwork, or pushing him on to further conclusions, or in any way tarnishing that intellectual integrity, which will not suffer one, out of mere self-respect, to pass doubtful intellectual coin. But those beautiful gods, with the whole round of their beautiful service, the Cyrenaic school definitely renounced: and Euemerus, who has given his name to the coldest and thinnest of all phases of rationalism, was one of its accredited masters.

The Greek morality, again, with all its imperfections, was certainly a comely thing.—Yes! a harmony, a music, in men's ways, one might well hesitate to jar. The merely æsthetic sense might have had a legitimate satisfaction in the spectacle of that fair order of choice manners; in those attractive conventions, enveloping, so gracefully, the whole of life; insuring some sweetness, some security at least against offense, in the intercourse of the world. The discreet master of Cyrene himself had been in all but entire practical sympathy with it. Beyond an obvious utility, it could claim, indeed, but custom—use-and-wont, as we say—for its sanction. But then, one of the advantages of that liberty of spirit among the Cyrenaics (in which through theory they had become dead to theory, so that all theory, as such, was really indifferent to them, and indeed nothing valuable but in its tangible ministration to life) was precisely this, that it gave them free play, in the use of things, as mere ministers, which, to the uninitiated, must be masters or nothing. Yet, how little the followers of Aristippus made of that whole comely system of manners or morals, then actually in possession of life, is shown by the bold practical consequence, which one of them maintained (with hard, self-opinionated adherence to his peculiar theory of values) in the not very amiable paradox that friendship and patriotism were things one could do without; while another—Death's-advocate, as he was called—helped so many to self-destruction, by his pessimistic eloquence on the evils of life, that his lecture-room was closed. That that was in the range of their consequences—that that was a possible, if remote, deduction from the premises of the discreet Aristippus—was surely an inconsistency in a thinker who professed above all things an economy of the moments of life; and such inconsistency, surely a double fault, in a thinker who had started with a very high ideal of intellectual severity. Those old Cyrenaics felt their way, as it were in the dark, we may be sure, like other men in the ordinary transactions of life, beyond the narrow limits they drew of clear and absolutely legitimate knowledge ; admitting what was not of immediate sensation, and drawing upon that " fantastic " future which might never come. A little more of such " walking by faith," a little more of reasonable " assent," and of that common sense by which eternal " Wisdom," it may be, " assists " the incomplete intelligence of the individual—and they might have profited by a hundred services to their culture, from Greek religion and Greek morality, as they actually were. The spectacle of their hard, isolated, tenacious hold on their own narrow apprehension, makes one think of a picture with no relief, no soft shadows or breadth of space, or of a drama without repose. Contrasted with the liberality of one like Socrates, their theory of practice, even at its best, has the narrowness—the fanatic narrowness—if, also, the intense force, of a " heresy."

Heresy, theologians are careful to explain, consists not so much in positive error, as in disproportion of truth ; in the exaggeration of this or that side or aspect, of the truth, out of the proportion of faith : it being assumed that such exceptional apprehensions of special aspects of the faith, by individual minds, are really provided for in the great system of catholic doctrine. Such a system—such a proportion of faith—is represented for us, in the moral order, by that body of moral ideas common to all Christian lands ; which, in those lands, forms a sort of territory common to human society and the Christian church, and which is, in reality, the total product and effect of all the higher moral experience of many generations, and all their aspirations after a more perfect world : it expresses the moral judgment of the honest dead—a body so much more numerous than the living.

And the drift of the evolution of morals has certainly been to allow those theories, which, as I have said, may easily become heresies ; theories which have, from time to time, expressed the finer, or the bolder, apprehensions of peculiar spirits—Bentham, Shelley, Carlyle, the old or the new Cyrenaics—theories, the motive of which is to bring special elements, or neglected elements it may be, of our common moral effort, into prominence, by explaining them in unusual terms, or in the terms of some non-moral interest in human life ; so much influence, but only so much, as they can exercise, in proportion with that system or organization of moral ideas, which, in Christian lands, are the common property of human society. And the moral development of the individual may well follow the tendency of that larger current, and permit its flights and heats, its élans, as the French say, only so much freedom of play as may be consistent with full sympathy with, and a full practical assent to, the moral preferences of that “ great majority,” which exercises the authority of humanity ; and is actually a vast force all around us. Harmonized, reduced to its true function, in this way, Cyrenaicism, old or new, with its ardent pursuit of beauty, might become, as I said, at the least a very salutary corrective, in a generation which has certainly not overvalued the æsthetic side of its duties, or even of its pleasures. I have been making use of theological terms ; and there is another theological term which precisely expresses what I mean. Such or such a heroic proposal, say the theologians, is not a precept of the church, but a "counsel of perfection." Such counsels of perfection may become, by exaggeration or wilfulness, heresies ; yet they define the special vocations, success in which earns the "special crown," in the case of those for whom they are really meant ; and it is in this way that Cyrenaicism, with its worship of beauty—of the body—of physical beauty—might perform its legitimate moral function, as a "counsel of perfection," for a few.

For it was of perfection that Marius (to mount up to him again, from his intellectual heirs) had been really thinking, all the time : a narrow perfection it might be objected, the perfection of but one part of his whole nature—his capacities, namely, of feeling, of receiving exquisite physical impressions, of an imaginative sympathy—but still, a true perfection of those capacities, wrought out to their utmost degree, and admirable enough in its way. He is an economist : he hopes, by that "insight" of which the old Cyrenaics made so much, by a highly-trained skill in the apprehension of what the conditions of spiritual success really are, and the special circumstances of the occasion with which he has to deal—the special happinesses of his own nature—to make the most, in no mean or vulgar sense, of the few years of life ; few, indeed, for the attainment of anything like general perfection ! With the brevity of those years his mind is exceptionally impressed ; and this purpose makes him no frivolous dilettante, but graver than other men : his scheme is not that of a trifler, but rather of one who gives a meaning of his own, but a quite real and sincere one, those old words—Let us work while it is day ! He has a strong apprehension, also, of the beauty of the visible things around him ; their fading, momentary graces and attractions. His own natural susceptibility in this direction, confirmed by experience, demands of him an almost exclusive preoccupation with the aspects of things ; their æsthetic character, as it is called—their revelations to the eye and the imagination : not so much because the spectacle of these elements in them yields him the largest amount of enjoyment, as because to be occupied, in this way, with the æsthetic or imaginative side of things, is to be in real contact with those elements of his own nature, and of theirs, which, for him at least, are matters of the most real kind of apprehension. As other men concentrate themselves on truth of number, or on business, or it may be on the pleasures of appetite, so he is wholly bent on living in that full stream of refined sensation ; and in the prosecution of this love of beauty, he claims an entire personal liberty of heart and mind—liberty, above all, from conventional answers to first questions.

But, without him there is a venerable system of sentiment and ideas, widely extended in time and place, actually in a kind of impregnable possession of human life—a system, which, like some other great products of the conjoint efforts of human mind through many generations, is rich in the world's experience; so that, in attaching oneself to that, one lets in a great tide of that experience, and makes, as it were with a single step, a great experience of one's own; with a great, consequent increase to one's mind, of color, variety, and relief, in the spectacle of men and things. The mere sense of belonging to a system—an imperial system or organization—has, in itself, the expanding power of a great experience; as some have felt who have been admitted from narrower sects into the communion of the Roman church; or as the old Roman citizen felt. It is, we might fancy, like the coming into possession of a very widely spoken language, with a vast literature, which is also the speech of the people we have to live among.

Cyrenaic or Epicurean doctrine, then—the Cyrenaicism with which Marius had come to Rome, or our own new Cyrenaicism of the nineteenth century—does but need its proper complement. Refer it, as a part to the whole, to that larger, well-adjusted system of the old morality, through which the better portion of mankind strive, in common, towards the realization of a better world than the present—give it a modus vivendi, as lawyers say, with that common everyday morality, the power of which is continuous in human affairs—excise its antinomian usurpations; and the heresy becomes a counsel of perfection. Our Cyrenaic finds his special apprehension of the fact of life, amid all his own personal color of mind and temper—finds himself again--though it be--but as a single element in an imposing system, a wonderful harmony of principles, exerting a strange power to sustain--to carry him and his effort still onward to perfection, when, through one's inherent human weakness, his own peculiar source of energy fails him, or his own peculiar apprehension becomes obscured for a while.

A wonderful order, actually in possession of the world!--grown over it and into it, inextricably; penetrating into its laws, its very language, its mere habits of decorum, in a thousand half-conscious ways; yet still felt to be, in part, an unfulfilled ideal; and, as such, awakening hope, and an aim, which is identical with the one only consistent, aspiration of mankind! In the apprehension of that, just then, Marius seemed to have joined company again with his own old self; to have overtaken on the road the pilgrim who had come to Rome, with absolute sincerity, on the search for perfection. It defined not so much a change of practice, as of sympathy--a change, an expansion, of sympathy. There was involved in it, certainly, a voluntary curtailing of his liberty, in concession to the actual manner, the distinctions and enactments of that great crowd of admirable spirits, who have elected so, and not otherwise, in their conduct of life; and who are not here to give one, so to term it, an "indulgence." But then, under the supposition of their frown, no roses would ever seem worth plucking again. The authority they exercised was like that of classic taste--an influence so subtle yet so real, and which defines the loyalty of the scholar—or of some beautiful and venerable ritual, in which every observance has become spontaneous and almost mechanical, yet is found, the more carefully one considers it, to have a reasonable significance and a real history.

And Marius saw that he would be but an inconsistent Cyrenaic—mistaken in his estimate of values, of loss and gain, and untrue to the well-considered economy of life which he had brought to Rome with him—that some drops of the great cup would fall to the ground—if he did not make that concession, if he did but remain just there.

CHAPTER XVII.

MANY PROPHETS AND KINGS HAVE DESIRED TO SEE THE THINGS WHICH YE SEE.

THE enemy on the Danube was, indeed, but the vanguard of the mighty invading hosts of the fifth century. Illusively repressed just now, those confused movements along the northern boundary of the Empire were destined to unite triumphantly at last, in the barbarism, which, powerless to destroy the Christian church, was yet to suppress for a time the achieved culture of the pagan world : and with this lamentable result, that the kingdom of Christ grew up in a somewhat false alienation from the beauty and light of the kingdom of the natural man, developing a partly mistaken tradition concerning it, and an incapacity, as it might almost seem at times, for eventual reconciliation with it. Meantime, Italy had armed itself once more, in haste ; and the imperial brothers set forth for the Alps.

Whatever misgiving the Roman people may have felt as to the leadership of the younger of them was unexpectedly set at rest ; though with some temporary regret for the loss of what had been, after all, a popular figure on the world's stage. Travel.

ing fraternally in the same litter with Aurelius, Lucius Verus was struck with sudden and mysterious disease, and died as he hastened back to Rome. His death awoke a swarm of sinister rumors, to settle—on Lucilla, jealous, it was said, of Fabia her sister, perhaps of Faustina—on Faustina herself, who had accompanied the imperial progress, and was anxious now to hide a crime of her own—even on the elder brother, who, beforehand with the treasonable designs of his colleague, should have helped him at supper to a favorite morsel, cut with a knife poisoned ingeniously on one only of its sides. Aurelius, certainly, with unfeigned distress, his long irritations, so dutifully repressed or disguised, turning now into a single sentiment of regret for the human creature, carried the remains back to Rome, and demanded of the Senate a public funeral, with a decree for the apotheôsis, or canonization, of the deceased.

For three days the body lay in state before the Tribunal in the Forum, enclosed in an open coffin of cedar-wood, on a bed of ivory and gold, in the center of a sort of temporary chapel, representing the temple of Venus Genetrix; while armed soldiers watched around it, and choirs of chosen voices relieved each other in the chanting of hymns and monologues, from the great tragedians. At the head of the couch were displayed the various personal decorations which had belonged to Verus in life. Like all the rest of Rome, Marius went to gaze on the face which he had last seen hardly disguised under the hood of a traveling-dress, as the wearer hurried, at nightfall, along one of the streets below the palace on some amorous appointment. And unfamiliar as he still was with dead faces, he was taken by surprise, and touched beyond what he could have thought possible, by the piteous change there; even the skill of Galen having been not wholly successful in the process of embalming. It was as if a brother of his own were lying low before him, with that meek and helpless expression, which it would have been a sacrilege to treat rudely.

Meantime, in the center of the Campus Martius, within the grove of poplars enclosing the space where the body of Augustus had been burnt, the great funeral pyre, stuffed with shavings of various aromatic woods, had been built up in many stages, separated from each other by a light entablature of woodwork, and abundantly adorned with tapestries, flowers, and images. Upon the top of this pyramidal, or flame-shaped structure, was placed the corpse, hidden now under a mountain of garlands and incense brought by the women, who from the first had had their fondness for the wanton graces of the deceased. The dead body was surmounted by a waxen effigy of great size, arrayed in the triumphal ornaments; and at last the centurions, whose office it was, approached with their torches to ignite the pile at its four corners, while the soldiers, in wild excitement, ran around it, casting into the flames the decorations they had received for acts of valor under his command.

It had been a really heroic order, spoiled a little, at the last moment, through the somewhat tawdry artifice, by which an eagle—not a very noble or youthful specimen of its kind—was made to take flight from the perishing remains ; a court chamberlain according to ancient etiquette, subsequently making official declaration, before the Senate, that the imperial genius had been seen in this way, escaping from the ashes. And Marius was present when the Fathers, duly certified of the fact, by “acclamation,” muttering their judgment all together, in a kind of low, rhythmical chant, decreed—cælum—the privilege of divine rank, to the departed.

The actual gathering of the ashes in a white cerecloth by the widowed Lucilla, when the last flicker had been extinguished by drops of wine ; and the conveyance of them to the little cell, already populous, in the central mass of the sepulcher of Hadrian, still in all the splendor of its statues and colonnades, were a matter of private or domestic duty ; after the due accomplishment of which Aurelius was at liberty to retire for a time into the privacy of his beloved apartments on the Palatine. And hither, not long afterwards, Marius was summoned a second time, to receive from the imperial hands the great pile of manuscripts it was to be his business to revise and arrange.

Just one year had passed since his first visit to the palace ; and as he climbed the stairs to-day, the great cypresses rocked against the sunless sky, like living creatures in pain. He had to traverse a long subterranean gallery, once a secret entrance to the imperial apartments, and in our own day, amid the ruin of almost all else around it, as smooth and fresh as if the carpets had but just been removed from the floor after the return of the emperor from the shows. It was here, on such an occasion, that the emperor Caligula, at the age of twenty-nine, had come by his end ; his assassins gliding through it upon him, while he stayed yet a little while longer to watch the exercises of a party of noble youths at play. As Marius waited, a second time, in the little red room, in the house of the chief chamberlain, curious to look once more at its painted walls—the very place into which the assassins were said to have turned for concealment after the murder—he could all but see the figure, which, in its surrounding light and darkness, had always seemed to him perhaps the most melancholy in the whole history of Rome. He called to mind the greatness of that early promise and popularity—the stupefying height of irresponsible power, from which, after all, only men’s viler side had been clearly visible—the incipient overthrow of reason—the irredeemable memory ; and still, above all, the beautiful head in which the noble lines of the family of Augustus were united to, he knew not what expression of fineness and sensibility, not theirs, and for the like of which one must pass onward to the Antonines. A legitimate popular hatred was careful to destroy the semblance of it, wherever it could be found ; but one bust, in dark bronze-like basalt of a wonderful finish and style, preserved in the Museum of the Capitol, is still one of the very finest art-treasures of Rome. Had the very seal of empire upon those somber brows, reflected to him from his mirror, suggested his mad attempts upon the liberty, the dignity of humanity—O humanity! what hast thou done to me that I should so despise thee?—And yet might not all that be indeed the true meaning of kingship, if the world would have one man to reign over it? that—or, some incredible, surely never to be realized, height of disinterestedness, in a king who should be the servant of all, quite at the other extreme of the practical dilemma involved in such a position. It was not till some time after his death that his body was decently interred by the sisters he had driven into exile. Fraternity of feeling had not been an invariable feature in the incidents of Roman story—one long Vicus Sceleratus, from its first dim foundation in a fraternal quarrel on the morrow of a common deliverance so touching—had not almost every step in it some gloomy memory of unnatural violence? Romans did well to fancy the traitress Tarpeia still “green in earth,” and established on a throne, at the roots of the Capitoline rock. If in truth the religion of Rome was everywhere in it, like the perfume of the funeral incense still in the air Marius was breathing, so also was the memory of its crimes, prompted by a hypocritical cruelty, down to the erring, or not erring, vestal, calmly buried alive there, only eighty years ago, under Domitian.

It was with a sense of relief that Marius found himself in the presence of Aurelius, whose look and gesture of friendly intelligence, as he entered, made him smile at the gloomy train of his own thoughts just then, although since his first visit to the palace a great change had passed over it. The clear daylight found its way now into empty rooms. To raise funds for the war, Aurelius, his luxurious brother being now no more, had determined to sell by auction the accumulated treasures of the imperial household. The works of art, and the dainty furniture, had been removed, and were now "on view" in the Forum, to be the delight or dismay, for many weeks to come, of the large public of those who were curious in such things. In such wise had Aurelius come to that condition of philosophic detachment, which he had affected as a boy, when he had hardly been persuaded to wear warm clothing, and to sleep otherwise than on the bare floor. But, in the empty house, the man of mind, who had always made so much of the pleasures of philosophic contemplation, felt freer in thought than ever. He had been reading, with less self-reproach than usual, in the Republic of Plato, those passages which describe the life of the king-philosophers—like that of hired servants in their own house—who, possessed of the "gold undefiled" of intellectual vision, forego so cheerfully all other riches. It was one of his happy days; one of those rare days, when, almost with none of the effort otherwise so constant with him, his thoughts came rich and full, converging in a mental view, as exhilarating to him as the prospect of some wide expanse of landscape to another man's bodily eye.

He seemed to lie readier than was his wont to those suggestions, conveyed by philosophic reason to an alert imagination—suggestions of a possible open country, commencing just upon the verge where all actual experience leaves off, but which experience, one's own and not another's, may one day occupy. In fact, he was seeking strength for himself, in his own way, before he started for that ambiguous earthly warfare which was to occupy the rest of his life. "Ever remember this," he writes, "that a happy life depends not on many things—ἐν ὀλίγοις κεῖται." And to-day, committing himself with a steady effort of volition to the mere silence of the great empty apartments, he might be said to have escaped (according to Plato's promise to those who live closely with philosophy) from the evils of the world.

In his "conversations with himself" Marcus Aurelius speaks often of a City on high, of which all other cities beside are but single habitations. It was from him that Cornelius Fronto, in his late discourse, had borrowed the expression: and he certainly meant by it more than the whole commonwealth of Rome, even in any idealization of it, however remote. Incorporate somehow with the actual city, whose goodly stones were lying beneath his gaze, it was also identical with that constitution of universal nature, by a devout contemplation of which it was possible for man to associate himself to the consciousness of God. It was in that new Rome that he had taken up his rest for awhile on this day, deliberately feeding his thoughts on the better air of it, as another might have gone for mental renewal to a favorite villa.

“Men seek retirement in country-houses, at the seaside, on the mountains; and you have yourself as much fondness for such places as another. Still, there is no proof of culture in that; for the privilege is yours of retiring into yourself whensoever you please—into that little farm of one’s own mind, where a silence so profound may be enjoyed.”—That it could make these retreats, was a plain consequence of the prerogative, the kingship of the mind over its own conditions, its real, inherent liberty.—“It is in thy power to think as thou wilt:—The essence of things is in thy thoughts about them:—All is opinion—conception:—No man can be hindered by another:—What is outside thy circle of thought is nothing at all to it; hold to this, and you are safe: One thing is needful—to live close to the divine genius within thee, and minister thereto worthily.”

And the first point in this true ministry, or culture, was to keep one’s soul in a condition of pure indifference and calm. How continually had public claims, the claims of other persons, with their rough angularities of character, broken in upon him, the shepherd of the flock. But after all, he had at least this privilege he could not part with, of thinking as he would: and it was well, now and then, by an effort of will, to indulge it for a time, under an artificial and systematic direction. The duty of thus making discreet, systematic use of the power of imaginative vision for the purposes of spiritual culture, "since the soul takes color from its fantasies," is a point he has frequently insisted on.

The influence of these seasonable meditations—a symbol, or sacrament, because an intenser form, of the soul's own proper and natural life—would remain upon it, perhaps for many days. There were experience she could not forget, intuitions beyond price, he had come by in this way, which were almost like the breaking of a physical light upon his mind; as the great Augustus was said to have seen a mysterious physical light, over there, upon the summit of the Capitol, where the altar of the Sibyl now stood. With a prayer, therefore, for inward quiet, and conformity to the divine reason, he read over some select passages from Plato, which bear upon the harmony of the reason, in all its forms, with itself "Could there be cosmos, that wonderful, reasonable order, in him, and nothing but disorder in the world without?" It was from that question he had passed on to the vision, of system, of the reasonable order, not in nature, but in the condition of human affairs the Celestial City, Uranopolis, Callipolis in which, a consciousness of the divine will being everywhere realized, there would be, among other felicitous differences from this lower visible order, no more quite hopeless death, of men, or children, or of their affections. He had tried to-day, as never before, to make the most of this vision of a new Rome; to realize it as distinctly as he could; and, as it were, to find his way along its streets, ere he went down into a world so irksomely different, to make his practical effort towards it, with a soul full of pity for men as they were. However distinct the mental image of that might have been to him, with the descent of one flight of steps from the palace into the market-place below, it would have retreated again, as if at touch of a magic wand, beyond the utmost verge of the horizon. But it had been, actually, in his clearest vision of it, a confused place, with but a recognizable tower or entry, here or there, and haunted by strange faces, whose new expression he, the great physiognomist, could by no means read. Plato, indeed, had been able to articulate, to see, in thought at least, his ideal city. But just because Aurelius had passed beyond Plato, in the scope of the philanthropy—the Philadelphia—he supposed there, he had been unable really to find his way about it. Ah! after all, according to Plato himself, all vision was but reminiscence, and this, his heart's desire, no place his soul had ever visited, in any region of the old world's achievements. He had but divined, by a kind of generosity of spirit, the void place, which another experience than his must fill.

Yet Marius noted the wonderful expression of peace, of quiet pleasure, on the countenance of Aurelius, as he received from him the rolls of fine clear manuscript, fancying the emperor had been really occupied with the famous prospect towards the Sabine and Alban hills, from those lofty windows.

CHAPTER XVIII.

“THE CEREMONY OF THE DART.”

THE ideas of Stoicism, so precious to Marcus Aurelius, ideas of large generalization (it must be repeated) have often induced, in those over whose intellects they have had real power, a chillness of heart. It was the distinction of Aurelius that he was capable of harmonizing them with the charities, the amenities, one might almost say, of a humorist; as also with the popular religion and its many gods. Those vasty conceptions of the later Greek philosophy had in them, in truth, the germ of a sort of austere opinionative “natural theology,” as it is called; and how often has that led to a socinian dryness—a hard contempt of everything in religion, which touches the senses, or charms the imagination, or really concerns the affections. Aurelius had made his own the secret of passing, naturally, and with no violence to his thought, to and fro, between the richly colored and romantic religion of those old gods who had been still human beings, and a somewhat fatalistic speculation upon the impassive, universal soul—circle whose circumference was everywhere and center nowhere—of which a series of purely logical necessities had evolved the formula. As in many another instance, those traditional pieties of the place and the hour had been derived by him from his mother—παρὰ τῆς μητρὸς τὸ θεοσεβές. Purified, as all such religion of concrete time and place needs to be purified, by a frequent confronting with the ideal of godhead, revealed by that innate theistic sense, in the possession of which Aurelius differed from the religious people around him, it was the ground of many a sociability with their simpler souls; and, for himself, a consolation, whenever the wings of his own soul flagged, in the trying atmosphere of intellectual speculation. A host of companions, guides, helpers, about him from of old time, “the very court and company of heaven,” objects for him of personal reverence and affection—their supposed presence determined the character of much of his daily life, and might prove the last stay of his human nature at its weakest. “In every time and place,” he had said, “it rests with thyself to use the event of the hour religiously: at all seasons worship the gods.” And when he said “worship the gods,” he did it as strenuously as all besides.

And yet, here again, how often must he have experienced disillusion, or even a revolt of feeling, at the contact with coarser natures to which his religious conclusions exposed him. At the beginning of the year A. D. 173 public anxiety was as great as ever; and, as before, it brought people’s superstition into unreserved play. For seven days the images of the old gods, and of some of the graver new ones, lay solemnly exposed in the open air, arrayed in all their ornaments, each one in his separate resting-place, amid lights and burning incense, while the crowd, following the imperial example, daily visited them ; with offerings of flowers to this or that particular divinity, according to the devotion of each.

But supplementing these old, official observances, the very wildest gods had their share of worship, like some strange creatures with strange secrets startled abroad into the open day. The delirious sort of worship of which Marius was a spectator in the streets of Rome, during the seven days of the Lectisternium, reminded him, now and again, of an observation of Apuleius—it was “as if the presence of the gods did not do men good, but weakened or disordered them.” Some jaded women of fashion, especially, found in certain oriental devotions, at once a relief for their tearful souls and an opportunity for personal display ; preferring this or that mystery, chiefly because the attire it required suited their peculiar style of beauty. And one morning Marius encountered an extraordinary crimson object, borne along in a litter, through an excited crowd—the famous courtesan Benedicta, still fresh from the bath of blood to which she had submitted herself, sitting below the scaffold where the victims provided for the purpose were slaughtered by the priests. Even on the last day of the solemnity, when the emperor himself performed one of the oldest ceremonies of the Roman religion, this fantastic piety asserted itself. There were victims enough, certainly, brought from the choice pastures of the Sabine mountains, and led around the city they were to die for, in almost continuous procession, covered with flowers and well-nigh worried to death before the time by the crowds pressing superstitiously to touch them. But some old-fashioned Romans, in these exceptional circumstances, demanded something more than that, in the way of a human sacrifice, after the old pattern ; as when, not so long since, some Gauls or Greeks had been buried alive in the Forum. At least, human blood should be shed : and it was through a wild multitude of fanatics, cutting their flesh with whips and knives and ardently licking up the crimson stream, that the emperor repaired to the temple of Bellona, and in solemn symbolic act cast the blood-stained spear, or "dart," which was preserved there, towards the enemy's country—towards that unknown world of German homes, still warm, as some thought, under the faint northern twilight, with those innocent affections of which Romans had lost the sense ; and the ruin of which (so much was clear, amid all doubts of abstract right or wrong on either side) was involved in what Aurelius was then preparing ; with—Yes ! the gods be thanked for that achievement of an invigorating philosophy !—almost with a light heart.

For, in truth, that departure, really so difficult, for which Marcus Aurelius had needed to brace himself so strenuously, came to test the power of a long-studied theory of practice : and it was the development of this theory—literally, a theôria, a view, an intuition—of the most important facts, and still more important possibilities, concerning man in the world—that Marius now discovered, almost as if by accident, below the dry surface of the manuscripts entrusted to him. The great purple rolls contained—statistics, a general historical account of the writer's own time, and an exact diary : all alike, though in three different degrees of approach to the writer's own personal experience, laborious, formal, self-suppressing. All this was for the instruction of the public ; and a part of it has, perhaps, found its way into the Augustan Histories. But it was for the especial guidance of his son Commodus that he had permitted himself to break out, here and there, into reflections upon what was passing, into conversations with the reader. And then, as if put off his guard in that way, there had escaped into the heavy statistical matter, of which the main portion was composed, morsels of his conversations with himself. It was the romance of a soul (to be traced only in hints, wayside notes, quotations from older masters) as it were in lifelong, and often baffled search after some vanished or elusive golden fleece or Hesperidean fruit-trees, or some mysterious light of doctrine, ever retreating before him. A man, he had seemed to Marius from the first, of two lives, as we say. Of what nature, he had wondered sometimes, as, for instance, when he had interrupted his musings in the empty palace, might be that placid inward guest or inhabitant, who from amid the preoccupations of the man of practical affairs looked out surprised at the things and faces about it. Here, under the tame surface of a would-be life of business, Marius discovered, welcoming a brother, the spontaneous, irrepressible self-revelation of a soul as delicate as his own—a soul for which conversation with itself was a necessity of existence. Marius had always suspected that the feeling of such necessity was a peculiarity of his. Here, certainly, was another, in this respect like himself: and again he seemed to detect the advent of some new, or changed spirit into the world, mystic, and inward, and very different from that wholly external and objective habit of life, with which the old classic soul had satisfied itself: and his purely literary curiosity was greatly stimulated by this example of a book of self-portraiture. It was really the position of the modern essayist—creature of efforts rather than achievements, in the matter of apprehending truth—but at least conscious of lights by the way, which he must needs acknowledge. What seemed to underlie it was the desire to make the most of every outward or inward experience, to perpetuate and display what was so fleeting, in a kind of instinctive, pathetic protest against the imperial writer's own theory—that theory of the perpetual flux of all things—from of old so plausible to Marius.

Besides, there was a special doctrinal, or moral significance in the making of such conversation with oneself at all. The reasonable spark, the Logos in man, is common to him with the gods—κοινὸς αὐτοῖς πρὸς τοὺς θεοὺς—cum diis communis. That might seem but the truism of certain schools of philosophy: in Aurelius it was clearly an original and lively apprehension. There could be no inward conversation with oneself like that, unless there were indeed some one aware of our actual feelings and thoughts, pleased or displeased at one's disposition of oneself. Fronto too, the learned professor, could enounce that proposition of the reasonable community between men and God, in many different ways. But then, he was a cheerful man, and Aurelius a singularly sad one; and what to Fronto was but a doctrine, or a mere motive of rhetoric, was to the other a consolation. He walks and talks, for a spiritual refreshment, without which he would faint by the way, with what to the other is but a matter of philosophic eloquence.

In performing those public religious acts, Marcus Aurelius had ever seemed like one taking his part in some high, real, process, a real thing done, with more than the actually visible assistants about him. Here, in a hundred marginal flowers of feeling and language, happy new phrases of his own like the impromptus of a real conversation, or those quotations from other older masters of the inward life, taking new significance from the chances of such intercourse, was the record of his communion with that eternal reason, which was also his own proper self—with the intelligible companion, whose tabernacle was in the intelligence of men;—the journal of his daily commerce with that.

Chance or Providence! Chance: or Wisdom—one with nature and man; reaching from end to end, through all time and all existence, orderly disposing all things, according to fixed periods—as he describes it, in terms very like certain well-known words of the book of Wisdom—those are the “fenced opposites,” of the speculative dilemma, the tragic embarras, of which Aurelius cannot too often remind himself as the summary of man’s situation in the world. If there be such a provident soul “behind the veil,” truly, even to him, even in the most intimate of those conversations, it has never yet spoken with any quite irresistible assertion of its presence. Yet that speculative choice, as he has found it, is on the whole a matter of will—“’Tis in thy power,” again, here too, “to think as thou wilt.” And for his part he has made his choice and is true to it. “To the better of two things, if thou findest that, turn with thy whole heart: eat and drink ever of the best before thee.” “Wisdom,” says that other disciple of the Sapiential philosophy, “hath mingled her wine, she hath also prepared herself a table.”—Toῦ ἀριστοῦ ἀπόλαυε—“partake ever of Her best!” And what Marius, peeping now very closely upon the intimacies of that singular mind, found a thing actually pathetic and affecting, was the manner of his bearing as in the presence of this supposed guest; so elusive, so jealous of any broad manifestation of himself, so taxing to one’s faith, never allowing one to lean frankly upon him and be wholly at rest. Only, he would do his own part, at least, in maintaining the constant fitness, the quiet and sweetness of the guest-chamber. Seeming to vary with the intellectual fortune of the hour, from being the plainest account of experience, to a sheer fantasy, believed almost because it was impossible,—that one hope was, at all events, sufficient to make men's common pleasures, and common ambition, above all their commonest vices, seem very petty indeed, too petty to know of; and bred in him a kind of magnificence of character, in the old Greek sense of the term; a temper incompatible with any merely plausible advocacy of his convictions, or merely superficial thoughts about anything whatever, or talk about other people, or speculation as to what was passing in their so visibly little souls, or much talk of any kind, however clever or graceful. A soul thus disposed had already entered into the better life—was indeed in some sort a priest, a minister of the gods. Hence, his constant circumspection; a close watching of his soul, almost unique in the ancient world.—Before all things examine into thyself: strive to be at home with thyself!—Marius a sympathetic witness of all that, might almost seem to have foreseen monasticism itself, in the prophetic future. With this mystic companion he had gone a step onward, out of the merely objective pagan world. Here was already a master in that craft of self-direction, which was then coming to play so large a part in the human mind, at the prompting of the Christian church.

Yet it was in truth a very melancholy service, a service upon which one must needs move about, solemn, serious, depressed : with the hushed footsteps of people who move about a house of mourning where a dead body is lying. That was an impression which occurred to Marius, again and again, as he read, with the growing sense of some profound dissidence from his author. By certain, quite traceable links of association, he was reminded, in spite of the moral beauty of the philosophic emperor's ideas, how he had sat, essentially unconcerned, at the gladiatorial shows. For, actually, his contemplations had made him of a sad heart ; inducing in him that sadness—Tristitia—which even monkish moralists have held to be of the nature of mortal sin, akin to the mortal sin of—Desidia—Inactivity or Sloth. Resignation, a somber resignation, a sad heart, patient bearing of the burden of a sad heart—Yes! that was in the situation of an honest thinker upon the world. Only, here there was too much of a tame acquiescence in it. And there could be no true Théodicée in that ; no real accommodation of the world as it is, to the divine pattern of the Logos over against it. It amounted to a tolerance of evil.

The soul of good, though it moveth upon a way thou canst but little understand, yet prospereth on the journey :

If thou sufferest nought contrary to nature, there can be nought of evil with thee there :

If thou hast done anything in harmony with that reason in which men are communicant with the gods, there also can be nought of evil with thee—nothing to be afraid of:

Whatever is, is right ; as from the hand of one dispensing to every man according to his desert :

If reason fulfil ~~any~~ part in things, what more dost thou require ?

Dost thou take it ill that thy stature is but of four cubits?
That which happeneth to each of us is for the profit of the whole :

The profit of the whole, that was sufficient !

Those were some of the links in a train of thought really generous. Only, actually, its forced and yet too facile optimism, refusing to see evil anywhere, had no secret of genuine cheerfulness in it ; it left a weight upon the spirits. No ! with that weight unlifted there could indeed be no genuine Théodicée, no real justification of the ways of Heaven to man. "Let thine air be cheerful," he had said ; and, with an effort did at times himself attain to that serenity of aspect, which surely ought to accompany, as their outward flower and favor, assumptions like those. Still, what in Aurelius was a passing expression, was in Cornelius (Marius could but note the contrast) nature, and a veritable physiognomy. It was in fact, we may say, nothing less than the joy which Dante apprehended in the blessed spirits of the perfect ; the outward expression of which, like a physical light upon human faces, from the land which is very far off, we may trace from Giotto, and even earlier, to its consummation in the purer and better work of Raffaëlle,—the serenity, the durable cheerfulness, the blitheness of those who had been indeed delivered from death, of which the utmost degree of that famed Greek blitheness or Heiterkeit is but a transitory gleam, as in careless and wholly superficial youth. And yet, in Cornelius it was certainly united with the bold recognition of evil as a fact in the world ; as real as an aching in the head or heart, which one instinctively desires to have cured ; an enemy with whom no terms could be made, visible, hatefully visible, in a thousand forms—in the apparent wasting of men's gifts in an early, or even in a late grave ; in the death, as such, of men, and even of animals ; in the disease and pain of the body.

And there was another point of dissidence between Aurelius and his reader.—The philosophic Aurelius was a despiser of the body. Since it is “the peculiar privilege of reason to move within herself, and to be proof against corporeal impressions, suffering neither sensation nor passion, both of which are of animal and inferior quality, to break in upon her ;” it must follow that the true aim of the spirit will be to treat the body—ὁ σωματικὸς νεκρὸς—ever a carcass rather than a companion—as a thing really dead, a corpse ; and actually to promote its dissolution. And here again, in opposition to an inhumanity like this, presenting itself to that young reader as nothing less than a kind of sin against nature, the person of Cornelius sanctioned or justified the delight Marius had always had in the body ; at first, as but one of the consequences of his material or sensualistic philosophy. To Cornelius, the body of man was unmistakably, as a later seer terms it, the one temple in the world (“we touch Heaven when we lay our hand upon a human body”), and the proper object of a sort of worship, or sacred service, in which the very finest gold might have its seemliness and due symbolic use—Ah ! and of what awe-stricken pity or reverence also, in its dejection, down even to the perishing white bones of the poor man's grave!

Some flaw in vision, thought Marius, must be involved in the philosopher's contempt for it—some disease in thought, or moral dulness; leading logically to what seemed to him the strangest of all the emperor's inhumanities, the humor of the suicide; for which there was just then, indeed, a sort of mania in the world. " 'Tis part of the business of life," he read, " to lose it handsomely "—On due occasion "one might give life the slip"—The mental and moral powers might flag with one; and then it were a fair question, precisely, whether the time for taking leave had not come—"Thou canst leave this prison when thou wilt. Go forth boldly!"—Just there, in the mere capacity to entertain that question at all, there was what Marius, whose heart must always leap up in loyal gratitude for the mere, physical sunshine, if for nothing else, touching him as it touched the flies in the air, could not away with. In that, surely, was the sign of some distortion in the natural power of apprehension. It was the attitude, the melancholy intellectual attitude, of one who might be greatly mistaken in things—who might make the greatest of mistakes.

A heart that could forget itself in the misfortune, and even the weakness of others:—of that, Marius had certainly found the trace, as a confidant of the emperor's conversations with himself, in spite of those jarring inhumanities, his pretension to a stoical indifference, and the many difficulties of his manner of writing. He found it again not long afterwards, in still stronger evidence, in this way. As he read one morning early, there slipped from the rolls of manuscript a sealed letter with the emperor's superscription, which might well be of importance, and he felt bound to deliver it at once in person ; Aurelius being then absent from Rome in one of his favorite retreats, at Præneste, taking a few days of quiet with his young children, before his departure for the war. A long day passed as Marius crossed the Campagna on horseback, pleased by the random autumn lights bringing out in the distance the sheep at pasture, the shepherds in their picturesque dress, the golden elms, tower and villa : and it was long after dark that he mounted the steep street of the little hill-town to the imperial residence. He was struck by an odd mixture of stillness and excitement about the place. Lights burned at the windows. It seemed that numerous visitors were within, for the courtyard was crowded with litters and horses in waiting. For the moment, indeed, all larger cares, even the cares of war, of late so heavy a pressure, had been forgotten in what was passing with the little Annius Verus ; who for his part had forgotten his toys, and had been lying all day across the knees of his mother, as a mere child's ear-ache grew rapidly to an alarming sickness with great manifest agony, only suspended a little, from time to time, as he passed from very weariness into a few minutes of unconsciousness. The country surgeon called in, had removed the imposthume with the knife. There had been a great effort to bear this operation, for the terrified child, hardly persuaded to submit himself, when his pain was at its worst, and even more for the parents. At last, amid a crowd of pupils pressing in with him, as the custom was, to watch the proceedings in the sick-room, the great Galen had arrived, only to pronounce the thing done visibly useless, the patient now fainting into longer intervals of delirium. And it was just then, through the pressure of the departing crowd, that Marius was forced into being privy to a grief, the desolate face of which went deep into his memory, as he saw the emperor carry the child away—quite conscious now, but with a touching expression of helplessness and defeat upon it—pressed closely to his bosom, as if yearning just then for one thing only, to be united, to be absolutely one with it in its obscure distress.

CHAPTER XIX.

PARATUM COR MEUM, DEUS ! PARATUM COR MEUM.

THE emperor required only that the Senate should decree the erection of images, memorial of the dead child ; that a golden image of him should be carried, with the other images, in the great procession of the Circus, and that his name should be inserted in the Hymn of the Salian Priests : and so, stifling private grief, without further delay set forth for the war.

True kingship, as Plato, the old master of Aurelius, had understood it, was essentially of the nature of a service.—If so be, you can discover a mode of life more desirable than the being a king, for those who shall be kings ; then, the true Ideal of the State will become a possibility ; and not otherwise. And if a life of Beatific Vision be indeed possible, if philosophy really concludes in an ecstasy affording its full fruition to the entire nature of man ; then, for certain elect souls at least, a mode of life will have been discovered more desirable than being a king. By love or fear you might induce such an one to forego his privilege ; to take upon him the distasteful task of governing other men, or even of leading them to victory in battle : and by the very conditions of its tenure, his dominion would be wholly a ministry to others ; he would have taken upon him "the form of a servant ;" he would be reigning for the well-being of others, not for himself. The true king, the rightful king, would be Saint Lewis, exiling himself from the better land and its perfected company—so real a thing to him, as real and definite as the pictured pages of his psalter—to arbitrate, or to take part in, men's quarrels about the transitory appearances of things. In a lower degree—lower, in proportion as the highest Platonic dream is lower than any Christian vision—the true king would be Marcus Aurelius, drawn from the meditation of books, to be the leader of the Roman people in peace, and still more, in war.

To Aurelius, certainly, the philosophic mood, the visions, however dim, which this mood brought with it, were pleasant enough, together with those endearments of home, to make his public rule nothing less than a sacrifice of himself according to Plato's requirements, now consummated in his setting forth to the campaign on the Danube. That it was such a sacrifice was to Marius a visible fact, as he saw him ceremoniously lifted into the saddle amid all the pageantry of an imperial departure, but with the air less of a triumphant and self-willed leader than of one in some way or other defeated. Through the fortunes of the subsequent years, passing and repassing so inexplicably from side to side, the rumors of which reached him amid his own quiet studies, Marius seemed always to see that central image, with its habitual hue of dejection grown now to an expression of positive suffering ; all the stranger from its contrast with the magnificent armor worn by the emperor on that occasion, as it had been worn by his predecessor Hadrian.

Totus et argento contextus et auro—clothed in its gold and silver, dainty as that old divinely constructed armor of which Homer speaks, but without its miraculous lightsomeness—he looked out baffled, moribund, laboring, like a comfortless shadow taking part in some shadowy reproduction of the labors of a Hercules through those mist-laden Northern confines of the civilized world. It was as if the familiar soul which had been so friendly disposed towards him were actually departed to Hades ; and when he read his Conversations afterwards, though he did not materially change his judgment of them, it was nevertheless with the allowance we make for the dead. The memory of that suffering image, while it certainly deepened his adhesion to what he could accept in those remains of Aurelius, added a strange pathos to what must seem the writer's mistakes. What, after all, had been the meaning of that incident, accepted as so fortunate an omen long ago, when the Prince, then a little child much younger than was usual, had stood in ceremony among the priests of Mars and flung his crown of flowers with the rest at the sacred image reclining on the Pulvinar? The other crowns lodged themselves here or there: when, Lo! the crown thrown by Aurelius, the youngest of them, alighted upon the very brows of the god, as if placed there by a careful hand ! He was still young, again, when on the day of his adoption by Antoninus Pius he saw himself in a dream, with as it were shoulders of ivory, like the images of the gods, and found them more capable than shoulders of flesh. Yet he was now well-nigh fifty years of age, and with two-thirds of life behind him was setting out upon a labor which was to fill the remainder of it with anxiety—a labor for which he had perhaps no capacity, certainly no taste.

That ancient suit of armor was almost the only object which Aurelius now possessed out of all those much cherished articles of vertu collected by the Cæsars, making the imperial residence like a magnificent museum. For not men only were needed for the war, so that it was necessary, to the great disgust alike of timid persons and of the lovers of sport, to arm the gladiators : money also was lacking. Accordingly, at the sole motion of Aurelius himself, unwilling that the public burden should be further increased, especially on the part of the poor, the whole of the imperial ornaments and furniture, a sumptuous collection of gems formed by Hadrian, with many works of the most famous painters and sculptors, even the precious ornaments of the imperial chapel or Lararium, and the wardrobe of the empress Faustina, who seems to have borne the loss without a murmur, were exposed for public auction. “These treasures,” said Aurelius, “like all else that I possess, belong by right to the Senate and people." Was it not a characteristic of the true kings in Plato that they had in their houses nothing of their own? Connoisseurs had a keen delight in the mere reading of the Prætor's list of the property for sale. For two months the learned in these matters were daily occupied in the appraising of the embroidered hangings, the choice articles of personal use selected for preservation by each succeeding age, the great outlandish pearls from Hadrian's favorite cabinet, the marvelous plate lying safe behind the pretty iron wickerwork of the shops in the goldsmiths' quarter. Meantime ordinary persons might inspect with interest objects which had been as daily companions to people so far above and remote from them—things so fine also in material and workmanship as to seem, with their antique and delicate air, a worthy survival of the grand bygone eras—like select thoughts or utterances, embodying the very spirit of the vanished past. The town became more pensive than ever over old fashions.

The pleasurable excitement of this last act of preparation for the great war being over, all Rome seemed to settle down into a singular quiet, likely to last long, as though bent only on watching from afar the languid, somewhat uneventful course of the contest itself. Marius took advantage of it as an opportunity for still closer study than of old; only now and then going out to one of his favorite spots on the Alban or the Sabine hills, for a quiet even greater than that of Rome, in the country air. Or one of those occasions, as if by the favor of an invisible power, withdrawing some unsuspected cause of oppression from around him, he enjoyed a quite unusual sense of self-possession—the possession of his own best and happiest self. After some gloomy thoughts overnight, he had awoke in the morning sunlight, full, in his entire refreshment, of that almost religious appreciation of sleep, the graciousness of its influence on men's spirits, which had made the old Greeks conceive of it as a god. It was like one of those old joyful wakings of childhood, now becoming rarer and rarer with him; and looked back upon with much regret as a measure of advancing age. In fact, the last bequest of this serene sleep had been a dream, in which, as once before, he had overheard those he loved best pronouncing his name very pleasantly, as they passed through the rich sunlight and shadow of a summer morning, along the pavement of a city—Ah! fairer far than Rome! In a moment, as he awoke, a dejection which of late had settled heavily upon him was lifted away as if by the motion of physical air.

That flawless serenity, better than the most pleasurable excitement, but so easily ruffled by chance collisions even with things or persons, he had begun to value as the greatest treasure in life, was to be wholly his to-day, he thought, as he rode towards Tibur, under the early sunshine; the old yellow marble of its villas glittering all the way before him on the hillside. Why might he not hold that serenity ever at command?—he asked himself—expert, as he had at last come to be, in the art to setting the house of his thoughts in order. "'Tis in thy power to think as thou wilt:" he repeated to himself—most serviceable of all the lessons enforced on him by these imperial conversations!—" 'Tis in thy power to think as thou wilt." And were those cheerful, sociable beliefs he had there seen so much of (that bold selection, for instance, of the hypothesis of an eternal friend to man, just hidden behind the veil of a mechanical and material order, yet only just behind it and ready perhaps even now to break through), after all, perhaps, really a matter of choice, and dependent on a deliberate act of volition on his part? Were they doctrines one might take for granted, generously take for granted—and led along by them, at first as but well-defined hopes, grow at last into the corresponding intellectual certitude? "It is the truth I seek"—he had read—"the truth, by which no one," gray and depressing as it might seem, "was ever really injured." And yet, on the other hand, the imperial wayfarer, he had been able to go along with so far on his pilgrimage, let fall many things concerning the practicability of a forced, constructive, methodical assent to principles or dogmas, which one could not do without. Were there (as the expression ἀναγκαῖα—which one could not do without—seemed to hint) opinions, without which life itself was almost impossible, and which had their sufficient ground of evidence in that fact? Experience certainly taught that, as with regard to the sensible world he could attend or not, almost at will, to this or that color, this or that train of sounds, amid the whole tumult of sound and color, so it was also, for a well-trained intelligence, in regard to the hum of voices which besiege the inward no less than the outward ear. Might it be not otherwise with those various and competing, permissible hypotheses, which, in that open field for hypothesis—one's own actual ignorance of the origin and tendency of our being—present themselves so importunately, some of them with so emphatic a reiteration, through all the mental changes of the various ages; present themselves as instinctive reflections of the facts of experience? Might the Will itself be an organ of knowledge, of vision?

On this day, certainly, no mysterious light, no irresistibly leading hand from afar reached him; only, the peculiarly tranquilizing influence with which it had begun increased steadily upon him, in a manner with which, as he conceived according to his habit, the aspects of the place he was then visiting had something to do. The air there, air which it was fancied had the singular property of preserving or restoring the whiteness of ivory, was pure and thin. An even veil of lawn-like white cloud had now drawn over the sky; and under its broad, shadowless light every tone and hue of time came out upon the old yellow temples and houses, seeming continuous with the rocks they rose from. Some half-conscious motive of poetic grace would appear to have determined their grouping; partly resisting, partly going along with the natural wildness and harshness of the place, its floods and precipices. An air of immense age possessed, above all, the vegetation around—a world of evergreen trees—the olives especially (older than how many generations of men's lives!) fretted and twisted by the combining forces of life and death, into every conceivable caprice of form. In the windless weather all seemed to be listening to the roar of the immemorial waterfall, plunging down so unassociably among these human habitations, and with a motion so unchanging from age to age as to count, even in this time-worn place, as an image of unalterable rest. Yet the clear sky all but broke, to let through the ray which was silently quickening everything in the late February afternoon, and the unseen violet refined itself through the air. It was as if the spirit of life in nature were but withholding any too precipitate revelation of itself, in its slow, wise, maturing work.

Through some accident to the trappings of his horse at the inn where he rested, Marius had an unexpected delay. He sat down in one of those olive-gardens, and, all within and around him turning still to reverie, the course of his own life hitherto seemed to retire from him into some other world, distinct from the point at which he was now placed to watch it, like the distant road below, over which he had traveled that morning across the Campagna. Through a dreamy land he could see himself moving, as if in another life, detached from the present, and like another person, through all his fortunes and misfortunes, passing from point to point, weeping or delighted, escaping from various dangers. And the vision brought, first of all a forcible impulse of nothing else than gratitude, as if he must actually look round for some one to share his joy with—to whom he might tell of it, as a relief. Companionship, indeed, familiarity with souls noble and gifted, or at least sweet to him, had been, through this and that long space of it, the chief delight of the journey : and was it only the general sense and residue of that familiarity, diffused through his memories, which, in a while, suggested the question whether there had not been—besides Flavian, besides Cornelius even, and through the solitude which in spite of ardent friendship he had perhaps loved best of all things—a companion, a perpetual companion, ever at his side throughout ; doubling his pleasure in the roses by the way, recipient of his depression or peevishness, above all, as of old, of his grateful recognition of the fact that he himself was there at all ? Would not all have faded away altogether, had he been left for one moment really alone in it ? In his deepest apparent solitude there had been rich entertainment. It was as if there were not one but two wayfarers, side by side, visible there across the plain, as he indulged his fancy. A bird came and sang among the wattled hedge-roses : an animal feeding crept nearer : the child who kept it was gazing quietly : and the scene and the hour still conspiring, he passed from that mere fantasy of a self not himself, beside him in his coming and going, to those divinations of a breath of the spirit, at work in all things, of which there had been glimpses for him from time to time in his old philosophic readings—in Plato, in Aristotle, and others—last but not least, in Aurelius. Through one reflection upon another, he passed from those instinctive feelings or divinations, to the thoughts which articulate and give them logical consistency, and formulate at last, out of our experiences of our own and the world's life, that reasonable Ideal, which the Old Testament calls the Creator, and the Greek philosophers Eternal Reason, and the New Testament the Father of Men—as one builds up from act and word and expression of the friend actually visible at one's side, an ideal of the spirit within him.

In this peculiar and privileged hour, his body, as he could recognize, although just then, in the whole sum of its capacities, so entirely possessed by him—nay! by some mysterious intimacy, actually his very self—was yet determined by a vast system of material influences external to it, a thousand combining elements from earth and sky, in the currents of the air, on that bland afternoon. Its powers of apprehension were but susceptibilities to influence. Its perfection of capacity might be said to lie in this, that it surrendered itself impassively, like a leaf on the wind, to the motions of the great stream of material energies outside itself. Might not the intellectual being also, which was still more intimately himself, after that analogy of the bodily life, be but a moment, an impulse or series of impulses, belonging to an intellectual system without him, diffusing itself through all time and place—that great stream of spiritual energy, of which his own imperfect thoughts, yesterday or to-day, were the remote, and therefore imperfect, pulsations. It was the hypothesis (boldest, yet in reality most conceivable of all hypotheses) which had dawned on the contemplations of the two opposed great masters of the old Greek thought, alike:—the World of Ideas, existent only in and by their being known, as Plato conceived; the creative, incorruptible, informing Mind, supposed by Aristotle, so sober-minded, yet in this matter left, after all, something of a mystic. Might not that whole material world, then playing so masterfully upon his bodily organization, the very scene around him, the immemorial rocks, the carved marble, the rushing water, be themselves but reflections in, or a creation of, that perpetual mind, wherein he too became conscious, for an hour, a day, or for so many years? Upon what other hypothesis could he so well understand the persistency of all these things for his own intermittent consciousness of them, for the intermittent consciousness of so many generations, fleeting away one after another? It was easier to conceive of the material fabric of the world around him as but an element in a world of thought—as a thought in a mind—than of mind as an element, or accident, or passing condition, in a material order; because mind was really nearer to himself: it was an explanation of what was less known by what was known better. Just then, the merely material world, so often like a heavy wall about him, seemed the unreal thing, and to be breaking away all around;

and he felt a quiet hope and joy in the dawning of this doctrine upon him as an actually credible opinion: it was like the dawning of day over a vast prospect with the "new city" in it. That divine companion figured no longer as only an occasional wayfarer beside him, but as the unfailing "assistant," without whose inspiration and concurrence he could not breathe or see, instrumenting his bodily senses, rounding and supporting his imperfect thoughts. How often had the recollection of their transitoriness spoiled his most natural pleasures in life, actually confusing his sense of them by a suggestion of failure and death in everything! How had he longed, sometimes, that there were indeed one to whose memory he could commit his own most fortunate moments, his admiration and love, nay! the very sorrows of which he could not bear quite to lose the sense—one, strong to retain them even should he forget, in whose abler consciousness they might remain present as real things still, over and above that mere quickening of capacity which was all that remained of them in himself! And he had apprehended to-day, in the special clearness of one privileged hour, that in which the experiences he most valued might as it were take refuge—birds of passage as they were for himself, in and by himself, soon out of sight or with broken wing; yet not really lost, after all, on their way to the enduring light, in which the fair hours of life would present themselves as living creatures forever before the perpetual observer. And again, that sense of companionship, of a person beside him, evoked the faculty of conscience—of conscience, as of old when he had been at his best—in the form not of fear, nor of self-reproach even, but of a certain lively gratitude.

Himself—his ideas and sensations—never fell again precisely into focus as on that day, yet he was the richer by its experience. But for once to have come into subjection to that peculiar mood, to have felt the train of reflections which belong to it really forcible and conclusive—to have been led by them to a conclusion—to have apprehended the Great Ideal, so palpably that it defined a personal gratitude and the sense of a friendly hand laid upon him amid the shadows of the world, made this one particular day among all days a space marked in life and forever recognizable. It gave him a definite and ascertained measure of his moral or intellectual need, of what his soul really demanded from the powers, whatever they might be, which had brought him, as he was, into the world at all. And, again, would he be faithful to himself, to his own habits and leading suppositions, if he did but remain just there? Must not all the rest of his life be a seeking after the equivalent of that reasonable Ideal, among so-called actual things—a gathering up of every trace and note of it, here or there, which actual experience might present to him?

PART THE FOURTH.

CHAPTER XX.

TWO CURIOUS HOUSES.

I. GUESTS.

“Your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions.”

A NATURE like that of Marius, composed, in about equal parts, of instincts almost physical, and of slowly accumulated intellectual judgments, was perhaps even less susceptible than other men's characters of essential change. And yet the experience of that fortunate hour, seeming to gather into one central act of vision all the deeper impressions his mind had ever received upon it, did not leave him quite as he had been: for his mental view, at least, it changed measurably the world about him, of which he was still indeed a curious spectator, but which looked further off, was weaker in its hold, and, in a sense, less real to him, than ever. It was as if he viewed it, mentally, through a diminishing glass. And the permanency of this change he could note, some years later, when it happened that he was a guest at a feast, in which the various exciting elements of Roman life, its physical and intellectual accomplishments, its frivolity and far-fetched elegancies, its strange, mystic essays after the unseen, were elaborately combined. The great Apuleius, the poetic ideal of his boyhood, had come to Rome—was now visiting Tusculum, at the house of their common friend, a certain aristocratic poet who loved every sort of superiorities: and it was to a supper-party given in his honor that Marius had been invited.

It was with a feeling of half-humorous concession to his own early boyish hero-worship, and with some sense of superiority in himself, as he saw his old curiosity grown now almost to indifference, with a truer measure of its object when it was on the point of satisfaction at last, that he mounted to the little town on the hillside, the streets of which were broad flights of easy steps, gathered round a single great house below Cicero's villa on the heights, now in ruins and "haunted." There was a touch of weirdness in the circumstance that it was in this romantic place he had been bidden to meet the writer who had come to seem almost like one of the personages in his own fiction. Through the tall openings of the stair-cased streets, up which, here and there, the cattle were going home slowly from the pastures below, the Alban heights, between the great walls of the ancient houses, seemed close upon him—a vaporous screen of dun violet against the setting sun—with those waves of surpassing softness in their boundary line, characterizing them as volcanic hills. The coolness of the little brown market-place, for the sake of which even the working people were leaving the plain, in long file through the olive-gardens, to pass the night, was grateful, after the heats of Rome. Those wild country figures, clad in every kind of fantastic patchwork, stained by wind and weather fortunately enough for the eye, under that significant light, inclined him to poetry. And it was a very delicate poetry of its kind, which seemed to enfold him, as passing into the poet's house he turned to glance for a moment towards the height above; whereupon, the numerous cascades of the precipitous garden of the villa, framed in the doorway of the hall, fell into a harmless picture, in its place among the pictures within, and hardly more real than they; a landscape-piece, in which the power of water—plunging into what unseen depths!—done to the life, was pleasant, and without its natural terrors.

At the further end of this bland apartment, fragrant with the rare woods of the old, inlaid paneling, the falling of aromatic oil from the ready-lighted lamps, the iris-root clinging to the dresses of the guests, as with the odors of the altars of the gods, the supper-table was spread, in all the daintiness characteristic of the agreeable petit maître, who entertained. He was already most carefully dressed; but, like Martial's Stella, perhaps consciously, meant to change his attire once and again during the banquet; in the last instance, for an ancient vesture (object of much rivalry among the young men of fashion, at that great sale of the imperial wardrobes), a toga, of altogether lost hue and texture. He wore it with the grace becoming the leader of a thrilling movement then on foot for the restoration of that disused garment, in which, laying aside the customary evening dress, all the visitors were requested to appear, setting off the dainty sinuosities and well-disposed "golden ways" of its folds, with harmoniously tinted flowers. The opulent sunset, blending pleasantly with artificial light, fell past the quiet ancestral effigies of old consular dignitaries, across the wide floor strewn with sawdust of sandal-wood, and lost itself in the heap of cool coronals, lying ready for the foreheads of the guests on a sideboard of old citron-wood. The crystal cups darkened with old wine, the hues of the early autumn fruit—mulberries, pomegranates, and grapes that had long been hanging under careful protection upon the vines, were almost as much a feast for the eye, as the dusky fires of the rare twelve-petaled roses. A favorite animal, white as snow, brought by one of the visitors, purred its way gracefully among the wine-cups, coaxed onward from place to place by those at table, as they reclined easily on their cushions of German eider-down, spread over the long legged, carved couches.

A highly refined modification of the acroama—a musical performance during a meal for the diversion of guests—came presently, hovering round the place soothingly; and so unobtrusively, that the company could not guess, and did not like to ask, whether or not it had been designed by their entertainer; inclining on the whole to think it some wonderful peasant-music peculiar to that wild neighborhood, turning, as it did now and then, to a solitary reed-note, like a bird's, while it wandered into the distance. It wandered quite away at last, as darkness with a bolder lamplight came on, and made way for another sort of entertainment. An odd, rapid, phantasmal glitter, advancing from the garden by torchlight, defined itself, as it came nearer, into a dance of young men in armor. Arrived at length in a portico, open to the supper-chamber, they contrived that their mechanical march-movement should fall out into a kind of highly expressive dramatic action: and with the utmost possible emphasis of dumb motion, their long swords weaving a silvery network in the air, they danced the Death of Paris. The young Commodus, already an adept in these matters, who had condescended to welcome the eminent Apuleius at the banquet, had mysteriously dropped from his place, to take his share in the performance; and at its conclusion reappeared, still wearing the dainty accouterments of Paris, including a breast-plate, composed entirely of overlapping tigers' claws, skilfully gilt. The youthful prince had lately assumed the dress of manhood, on the return of the emperor, for a brief visit, from the North; putting up his hair, in imitation of Nero, in a golden box dedicated to Capitoline Jupiter. His likeness to Aurelius, his father, had become, in consequence, more striking than ever; and he had one source of genuine interest in the great literary guest of the occasion, in that the latter was the fortunate holder of the monopoly of exhibiting wild beasts and gladiatorial shows in the province of Carthage, where he resided.

Still, after all complaisance to the perhaps somewhat crude tastes of the good emperor's son, it was felt that with a guest like Apuleius whom they had come prepared to entertain as veritable connoisseurs, the conversation should be learned and superior, and the host at last deftly led his company round to literature, by the way of bindings. Elegant rolls of manuscript from his fine library of ancient Greek books passed from hand to hand round the table. It was a sign for the visitors themselves to draw their own choicest literary curiosities from their bags, as their contribution to the banquet: and one of them, a famous reader, choosing his lucky moment, delivered in tenor voice the piece which follows, with a preliminary query as to whether it could indeed be the composition of Lucian of Samosata, understood to be the great mocker of that day—

“What sound was that, Socrates?” asked Chærephon. “It came from the beach under the cliff yonder, and seemed a long way off—And how melodious it was! Was it a bird, I wonder. I thought all sea-birds were songless.”

“It was a sea-bird,” answered Socrates, “a bird called the Halcyon, and has a note full of plaining and tears. There is an old story people tell of it. It was a mortal woman once, daughter of Æolus, god of the winds. Ceyx, the son of the morning-star, wedded her in her early maidenhood. The son was not less fair than the father; and when it came to pass that he died, the crying of the girl as she lamented his sweet usage, was—Just, that! And some while after, as Heaven willed it, she was changed into a bird. Floating now on bird's wings over the sea, she seeks her lost Ceyx, there; since she was not able to find him after long wandering over the land."

"That then is the Halcyon—the kingfisher," said Chærephon. "I never heard a bird like it before. It has truly a plaintive note. What kind of a bird is it, Socrates?"

"Not a large bird, though she has received large honor from the gods, on account of her singular conjugal affection. For whensoever she makes her nest, a law of nature brings round what is called Halcyon's weather—days distinguishable among all others for their serenity, though they come sometimes amid the storms of winter—Days like to-day! See how transparent is the sky above us, and how motionless the sea!—like a smooth mirror."

"True! A Halcyon day, indeed! and yesterday was the same. But tell me, Socrates, what is one to think of those stories which have been told from the beginning, of birds changed into mortals and mortals into birds? To me nothing seems more incredible."

"Dear Chærephon," said Socrates, "methinks we are but half-blind judges of the impossible and the possible. We try the question by the standard of our human faculty, which avails neither for true knowledge, nor for faith, nor vision. Therefore many things seem to us impossible which are really easy, many things unattainable which are within our reach ; partly through inexperience, partly through the childishness of our minds. For in truth, every man, even the oldest of us, is like a little child, so brief and babyish are the years of our life in comparison of eternity. Then, how can we, who comprehend not the faculties of gods and the heavenly host, tell whether aught of that kind be possible or no?—What a tempest you saw three days ago! One trembles but to think of the lightning, the thunder-claps, the violence of the wind! You might have thought the whole world was going to ruin. And then, after a little, came this wonderful serenity of weather, which has continued till to-day. Which do you think the greater and more difficult thing to do :—to exchange the disorder of that irresistible whirlwind to a clarity like this, and becalm the whole world again, or to refashion the form of a woman into that of a bird? We can teach even little children to do something of that sort,—to take wax or clay, and mold out of the same material many kinds of form, one after another, without difficulty. And it may be that to the Deity, whose power is too vast for comparison with ours, all processes of that kind are manageable and easy.—How much wider is the whole heaven than thyself?—More than thou canst express.

“Among ourselves also, how vast the differences we observe in men’s degrees of power! To you and me, and many another like us, many things are impossible which are quite easy to others. For those who are unmusical, to play on the flute ; to read or write, for those who have not yet learned ; is no easier than to make birds of women, or women of birds. From the dumb and lifeless egg Nature molds her swarms of winged creatures, aided, as some will have it, by a divine and secret art in the wide air around us. She takes from the honeycomb a little memberless live thing ; she brings it wings and feet, brightens and beautifies it with quaint variety of color—and Lo ! the bee in her wisdom, making honey worthy of the gods.

“ It follows, that we mortals, being altogether of little account ; able wholly to discern no great matter, sometimes not even a little one ; for the most part at a loss as to what happens even with ourselves ; may hardly speak with security as to what those vast powers of the immortal gods may be concerning Kingfisher, or Nightingale. Yet the glory of thy mythus, as my fathers bequeathed it to me, O ! tearful songstress ! —that will I too hand on to my children, and tell it often to my wives, Xanthippe and Myrto—the story of thy pious love to Ceyx, and of thy melodious hymns ; and above all of the honor thou hast with the gods ! ”

The reader's well-turned periods seemed to stimulate, almost uncontrollably, the eloquent stirrings of the eminent man of letters then present. The impulse to speak masterfully was visible, before the recital was well over, in the moving lines about his mouth—by no means designed, as detractors were wont to say, merely to display the beauty of his teeth : and one of his followers, aware of his humors, made ready to transcribe what he would say the sort of things of which a collection was then forming—the Florida or Flowers, so to call them, he was apt to let fall by the way : no impromptu ventures, but rather elaborate, carved ivories of speech, drawn, at length, out of the rich treasury of his memory, and as with a fine savor of old musk about them. Certainly in this case, thought Marius, it was worth while to hear a charming writer speak. Discussing, quite in our modern way, the peculiarities of those suburban views, especially the sea-views, of which he was a professed lover, he was also every inch a priest of Æsculapius, the patron-god of Carthage. There was a piquancy in his roco-co, very African, and as it were perfumed personality, though he was now well-nigh sixty years old—a mixture of that sort of Platonic spiritualism which could speak of the soul of man as but a sojourner in the prison of the body really foreign to it, with such a relish for merely bodily graces as availed to set the fashion in matters of dress, deportment, accent, and the like, nay ! with something also which reminded Marius of the vein of coarseness he had found in the “Golden Book.” All this made the total impression he conveyed a very uncommon one. Marius did not wonder, as he watched him speaking, that people freely attributed to him many of the marvelous adventures which he had recounted in that famous romance over and above the wildest version of his own actual history---his extraordinary marriage, his religious initiations, his acts of mad generosity, and his trial as a sorcerer.

But a sign came from the imperial prince that it was time for the company to separate. He was entertaining his immediate neighbors at the table with a trick from the streets ; tossing his olives in rapid succession into the air, and catching them as they fell, between his lips. His dexterity in this caused the mirth around him to become noisy, disturbing the sleep of the furry visitor : the learned party broke up ; and Marius withdrew, glad to escape into the open air. The courtesans with their large wigs of false blond hair, were lurking for the guests, with groups of curious idlers. A great conflagration was visible in the distance. Was it in Rome itself, or in one of the villages of the country ? Pausing on the terrace for a few minutes to watch it, Marius was for the first time able to converse intimately with Apuleius ; and in this moment of confidence the " illuminist," himself with hair so carefully arranged, and who had seemed so full of affectations, almost like one of those light women there, as it were, dropped a veil, and appeared, while still permitting the play of a certain element of theatrical interest in his bizarre tenets, to be ready to explain and defend his position reasonably. For a moment his fantastic foppishness, and his pretensions to idealism and vision, seemed to fall into an intelligible congruity with each other. In truth, it was the Platonic idealism, as he conceived it, which animated, and gave him so lively an interest in, the world of the purely outward aspects of men and things.—Did material things, such things as they had had around them all that evening, really need apology for being there, to interest one, at all? Were not all visible objects—the whole material world, according to the consistent testimony of philosophy, in many forms—full of souls; embarrassed perhaps, partly imprisoned, but still eloquent souls. Certainly, the philosophy of Plato, with its figurative imagery and apologue, its manifold æsthetic coloring, its measured eloquence, its music for the outward ear, had been, like Plato's old master himself, a two-sided or two-colored thing.—Apuleius was a Platonist: only, for him, the Ideas of Plato were no creatures of logical abstraction, but really informing souls, in every type and variety of sensible things. Those noises in the house all supper-time, sounding through the tables and along the walls—were they only startings in the old rafters, at the sound of the music and laughter; or rather importunities of the secondary selves, the true unseen selves, of all the things and persons around; essaying to break through their mere, frivolous, transitory surfaces, and reminding one of abiding essentials beyond them, which might have their say, their judgment to give, by and by, when the shifting of the meats and drinks at life's table should be over? Was not this the true significance of the Platonic doctrine—a hierarchy of divine beings, associating themselves with particular things and places, for the purpose of meditating between God and man, who only needs due attention to be aware of his celestial company, filling the air about him as thick as motes in the sunbeam, for the ray of sympathetic intelligence shot through it?

“Two kinds there are, of animated beings,” he exclaimed—“Gods, entirely differing from men in the infinite distance of their abode (one part of them only is seen by our blunted vision—those mysterious stars!) in the eternity of their existence, in the perfection of their nature, contaminated by no contact with us: and men, dwelling on the earth, with frivolous and anxious minds, with infirm and mortal members, with variable fortunes; laboring in vain; taken altogether in their whole species, perhaps, eternal; but, severally, quitting the scene in irresistible succession.

“What then? Has nature connected itself together by no bond, but allowed itself to be thus crippled, and split into the divine and human elements?—And you will say to me; If so it is, that man is so entirely exiled from the immortal gods that all communication whatever is denied him, and not one of them occasionally visits us, as a shepherd visits his sheep—to whom shall I address my prayers? Whom shall I invoke as the helper of the unfortunate, the protector of the good?

“There are certain divine powers of a middle nature, through whom our aspirations are conveyed to the gods, and theirs to us. Passing between the inhabitants of the earth and those of Heaven, they carry from one to the other prayers and bounties, supplication and assistance, being a kind of interpreters. This interval of the air is full of them ! Through them, all revelations, miracles, magical processes, are effected. For, specially appointed individuals of this number have their special provinces, administered according to the disposition of each. They wander without fixed habitation ; or dwell in men's houses—”

Just then a companion's hand, laid on the shoulder of the speaker in the darkness, carried him away, and the discourse broke off suddenly. But its singular utterances were sufficient to cast back on all the circumstances of this strange evening—the dance, the readings, the distant fire—a kind of allegoric expression ; and made the whole occasion seem like nothing so much as one of those same famous Platonic figures or apologues. When Marius recalled it, he seemed always to hear again the voice of genuine conviction, from amidst that scene of at best elegant frovolity, pleading for so boldly mystical a view of things. For a moment, but only for a moment, as he listened, the trees seemed, as of old, to be growing “close against the sky.” Yes ! the reception of theory, of hypothesis, did depend a great deal on temperament ; was the equivalent of temperament. That celestial ladder, or hierarchy, was what experience suggested to Apuleius : it was what, in slightly different forms, certain persons in every age had tended to believe ; they were glad to hear it asserted, on the authority of a grave philosophy :

although he, Marius, certainly, would never feel that force of kindly warmth in the very contact of the air about him. Yearning, as much as they, for audible or visible companionship, in that hard world of Rome—for some wing, not visionary, across its unpeopled sky—he must still object, that they assumed all that with too much facility. His second thought upon it was that the presentation, even for a few moments of such fantastic vision, left the actual world more lonely. The little godship for whom the countryman (unconscious Platonist) trimmed his twinkling lamp, would never slip, for him, out of the bark of these immemorial olive-trees—no! not even in the wildest moonlight. And for himself, he must still hold by what his eyes really saw. Only, he had to concede also, that this boldness of Platonic theory was the witness, at least, to a variety of human disposition, and a consequent variety of mental view, which might—who could tell?—be correspondent to, be defined by and define, varieties of facts, of truths just “behind the veil,” regarding the world they all alike had before them for their given premiss; a world, wider, perhaps, in its possibilities, than all possible fancies about it.

CHAPTER XXI.

TWO CURIOUS HOUSES.

II. THE CHURCH IN CECILIA'S HOUSE.

“Your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions.”

CORNELIUS had certain friends in or near Rome, whose household, to Marius, as he pondered now and then what might be the determining influences of that peculiar character, presented itself as possibly its main secret—the hidden source from which he might derive the beauty and strength of a nature, so persistently fresh in the midst of a somewhat jaded world. But Marius had never yet seen those friends; and it was almost by accident that the veil of reserve was at last lifted, and, with strange contrast to his visit to the poet's villa at Tusculum, he entered another curious house.

“The house in which she lives,” says that mystical German writer quoted once before, “is for the orderly soul, which does not live on blindly before her, but is ever, out of her passing experiences, building and adorning the parts of a many-roomed abode for herself, only an expansion of the body; as the body, according to the philosophy of Swedenborg, is but an expansion of the soul. For such an orderly soul, as she lives onward, all sorts of delicate affinities establish themselves, between her and the doors and passage-ways, the lights and shadows, of her outward abode, until she seems incorporate into it—till at last, in the entire expressiveness of what is outward, there is for her, to speak properly, no longer any distinction between outward and inward, at all; and the light which creeps at a particular hour on a particular picture or space upon the wall, the scent of flowers in the air at a particular window, become to her, not so much apprehended objects, as themselves powers of apprehension, and doorways to things beyond—seeds or rudiments of new faculties, by which she, dimly yet surely, apprehends a matter lying beyond her actually attained capacity of sense and spirit.”

So it must needs be in a world which is itself, we may think, together with that bodily “tent” or “tabernacle,” but one of the many vestures of the pilgrim soul, to be left by her, worn out one by one, as if on the wayside; as it was from her, indeed, that they borrowed all the temporary value and significance they had.

The two friends were returning to Rome from a visit to a country-house, where again a mixed company of guests had been assembled—Marius, for his part, a little weary of gossip, and those sparks of ill-tempered rivalry, which seem sometimes to be the only sort of fire that the intercourse of men in general society can strike out of them. Mere reaction against all this, as they started in the clear morning, made their companionship, for one of them at least, not less tranquilizing than that solitude he so much valued. Something in the southwest wind combining with their own intention, favored increasingly, as the hours wore on, a serenity like that Marius had felt once before in journeying over the great plain towards Tibur—a serenity which was to-day brotherly amity also, and which seemed to draw into its owned charmed circle all that was then present to eye or ear, while they talked or were silent together, and all petty irritations, and the like, shrank out of existence, or were certainly beyond its limits. The natural fatigue of the long journey overcame them quite suddenly at last, while they were still about two miles distant from Rome. The endless line of tombs and cypress-trees had been visible for hours against the sky towards the West; and it was just where a cross-road from the Latin Way fell into the Appian, that Cornelius halted at a doorway in a long, low wall—the boundary-wall of the court of a villa, it might seem—as if at liberty to enter, and rest there awhile. He held the open door for his companion to enter also, if he would; with an expression, as he lifted the latch, which seemed to ask Marius, apparently shrinking from a possible intrusion—“Would you like to see it?”—Was he willing to look upon that, the seeing of which might define—yes! define the critical turning-point in his days?

The little doorway in this long, low wall, so old that it seemed almost a part of the rocky soil on which it was built, admitted them, in fact, into the outer courtyard or garden of a villa, disposed in one of those abrupt natural hollows, which give its character to the country in this place ; so that the house itself, and all its dependent buildings, the spaciousness of which surprised Marius as he entered, were wholly concealed from passengers along the road. All around, in those well-ordered precincts, were quiet signs of wealth and a noble taste—a taste, indeed, chiefly evidenced in the selection and juxtaposition of the material it had to deal with, consisting almost exclusively of the remains of older art, here arranged and harmonized, with effects both as regards color and form, so delicate, as to seem really derivative from a spirit fairer than any which lay within the resources of the ancient world. It was the old way of true Renaissance—the way of nature with her roses, the divine way with the body of man, and it may be with his very soul—conceiving the new organism, by no sudden and abrupt creation, but rather by the action of a new principle upon elements all of which had indeed lived and died many times. The fragments of older architecture, the mosaics, the spiral columns, the precious corner-stones of immemorial building, had put on, by such juxtaposition, a new and singular expressiveness, an air of grave thought and intellectual purpose, in itself, æsthetically, very seductive. Lastly, herb and tree had taken possession of it all, spreading their seed-bells and light branches, just alive in the trembling air, above the ancient garden-walls, against the wide spaces of sunset. And from the first they could hear singing—the singing partly of children, it would seem, and of a new sort; so novel indeed in its effect, that it carried the memory of Marius back to those old efforts of Flavian to conceive a new poesy. It was the expression not altogether of mirth, yet of a wonderful happiness—the blithe expansion of a joyful soul, in people upon whom some all-subduing experience had wrought heroically, and who still remembered, on this bland afternoon, the hour of a great deliverance.

His old native susceptibility to the spirit, the sympathies, of places—above all to any hieratic or religious expression they might have—was at its liveliest, as Marius, still possessed by that peculiar singing, and still amid the evidences of a grave discretion all around him, entered the house itself. That intelligent seriousness about life, the lack of which had always seemed to him to make those who were without it of some strange, different species from himself, summing up all the lessons of his experience, from those old days at White-nights, was concentrated here, as if in designed congruity with his favorite precepts of the power of physical vision, into an actual picture. If the true value of souls is in proportion to what they can admire, Marius was just then an acceptable soul. As he passed through the various chambers, great and small, one dominant thought increased upon him—the thought of chaste women and their children ; of the various affections of the family life amid its most natural conditions, but developed, in devout imitation of some sublime new type of it, into great controlling passions. There reigned throughout, an order and purity, an orderly disposition, as if by way of making ready for some gracious spousals. The place itself was like a bride adorned for her husband : and its singular cheerfulness, the abundant light everywhere, the sense of peaceful industry, of which he received a deep impression without precisely reckoning wherein it resided, as he moved on rapidly, were in forcible contrast just at first to the place to which he was next conducted by Cornelius : still with a sort of eager, hurried, half-troubled reluctance, and as if he forbore an explanation which might well be looked for by his companion.

An old flower garden in the rear of the house, set here and there with a venerable olive-tree—a picture in pensive shade and fiery blossom, as transparent, in that afternoon light, as the old miniature-painters' work on the walls of the chambers above—was bounded, towards the west, by a low, grassy hill. A narrow opening cut in its steep side, like a solid blackness there, admitted Marius and his gleaming companion into a hollow cavern or crypt, which was indeed but the family burial-place of the Cecilii (to whom this residence belonged) brought thus, after an arrangement then becoming not unusual, into immediate connection with the abode of the living ; in a bold assertion of the unity of family life, which the sanction of the Holy Family would, hereafter, more and more reinforce. Here was, in fact, the center of the peculiar religious expressiveness, the sanctity, of the whole place. "Every person makes the place that belongs to him a religious place at his own election, by the carrying of his dead into it"—had been a persuasion of old Roman law, which it was reserved for the early Christian societies, like that which the piety of a wealthy Roman matron had here established, to realize in all its consequences. Yet certainly it was unlike any cemetery Marius had ever yet seen: most obviously in this, that these people had returned to the older fashion of disposing of their dead by burial instead of burning. A family sepulcher in the first instance, it was growing into a vast necropolis, a whole township of the dead, by means of some free expansion of the family interest beyond its amplest natural limits. The air of venerable beauty which characterized the house and its precincts above, was maintained here also. It was certainly with a great outlay of labor that these long, seemingly endless, yet carefully designed galleries, were so rapidly increasing, with their orderly layers of beds or berths, one above another, cut on both sides of the pathway, in the porous black tufa, through which all the moisture filters downwards, leaving the parts above dry and wholesome. All alike were carefully closed, and with all the delicate costliness at command; some with simple tiles of baked clay, many with slabs of marble, enriched by fair inscriptions—marble, in some cases, taken from an older pagan tomb—the inscription sometimes a palimpsest, the new epitaph being woven into the fading letters of an earlier one.

As in a pagan cemetery, an abundance of utensils for the worship and commemoration of the dead was disposed around—incense, vessels of floating oil-lights, above all, garlands and flowers, relieved into all the stronger fieriness by the coal-like blackness of the soil itself in this place, a volcanic sandstone, the cinder of burn-out fires. (Would they ever kindle, take possession of, and transform the place again?) Turning into an ashy paleness where, at regular intervals, a luminare, or air-hole, let in a hard beam of clear but sunless light from above, with their heavy sleepers, row upon row, leaving a passage so narrow that only a single person could move along it at a time, cheek to cheek with them, the high walls seemed to shut one in, into the great company of the dead. Only just the long straight pathway remained before him; opening, however, here and there, into a small chamber, around a broad, table-like coffin, or “altar” tomb (one or more), adorned more profusely than the others, sometimes as if in observance of an anniversary. Clearly, these people, concurring here with the special sympathies of Marius himself, had adopted this practice of burial from some peculiar feeling of hope they entertained concerning the body; a feeling which, in no irreverent curiosity, he would fain have understood. The complete, irreparable disappearance of the dead on the funeral pyre, so crushing to the spirits, as he had found it, had long since given him a preference for this mode of settlement to the last sleep, as having something more homelike and hopeful about it, at least in outward seeming. But whence the strange confidence that these "handfuls of white dust" would hereafter recompose themselves once more into exulting human creatures? By what heavenly alchemy, what reviving dew from above, which was certainly never again to reach the dead violets?—Januarius, Agaietus, Felicitas—Martyrs! refresh, I pray you, the soul of Cecil, of Cornelius! said an inscription (one of many such) scratched, like a passing sigh, when the mortar was still fresh which had closed-in the prison-door. All criticism of this bold hope, apparently as sincere as it was audacious in its claim, being set aside, here, at least, carried further than ever before, was that pious, systematic commemoration of the dead, which in its chivalrous refusal to forget and wholly leave the helpless, had always seemed to Marius the central type or symbol of all natural duty.

The stern soul of Jonathan Edwards, applying the faulty theology of John Calvin, afforded him, we know, the vision of infants not a span long, on the floor of hell. All visitors to the Catacombs must have noticed, in a very different theological connection, the numerous children's graves—beds of infants, but a span long indeed—little, lowly prisoners of hope, on these sacred floors. It was with great curiosity, certainly, that Marius observed them; in some instances adorned with the favorite toys of their tiny occupants—toy-soldiers, little chariot-wheels, all the paraphernalia of a baby-house; and when he saw afterwards the living ones, who sang and were busy, above—sang their psalms Laudate Pueri Dominum!—their very faces caught for him a sort of quaint unreality, from the memory of those others, the children of the Catacombs, but a little way below.

Hic congesta jacet quæris si turba piorum :
Corpora sanctorum retinent veneranda sepulcra !—

Here and there, mingling with the record of merely natural decease, and sometimes even at these children's graves, were the signs of violent death or martyrdom—the proof that some “had loved not their lives unto the death”—in the little red phial of blood, the palm-branch, the red flowers for their heavenly “birthday.” It was in one sepulcher, in particular, distinguished in this way, and devoutly adorned for what, by a bold paradox, was thus treated as, natalitia—a birthday, that the arrangements of the whole place visibly centered. And it was with a curious novelty of feeling, of the dawning of a fresh order of experiences upon him, that, standing beside those mournful relics, snatched in haste from the common place of execution not many years before, Marius became, as by some gleam of foresight, aware of the whole possible force of evidence for a strange, new hope, defining a new and weighty motive of action in the world, in those tragic deaths for the “Christian superstition ;” of which he had heard something indeed ; but which had seemed to him hitherto but one savagery, one self-provoked savagery, the more, in a cruel and stupid world.

And that poignant memory of suffering seemed to draw him on towards a still more vivid and pathetic image of suffering, in a distant but not dim background. Yes ! the interest, the expression of the entire place was filled with that, like the savor of some precious incense. Penetrating the whole atmosphere, touching everything around with its peculiar sentiment, it seemed to make all this visible mortality, death itself, more beautiful than any fantastic dream of old mythology had ever hoped to make it ; and that, in a simple sincerity of feeling about a supposed actual fact. The thought, the word, Pax—Pax Tecum !—was put forth everywhere, with images of hope, snatched sometimes even from that jaded pagan world, which had really afforded men so little of it from first to last,—the consoling images it had thrown off, of succor, of regeneration, of escape from death,—Hercules wrestling with Death for possession of Alcestis, Orpheus taming the wild beasts, the Shepherd with his sheep, the Shepherd carrying the sick lamb upon his shoulders. Only, after all, these imageries formed but the slightest contribution to the whole dominant effect of tranquil hope there—of a kind of heroic cheerfulness and grateful expansion of heart ; again, as with the sense of some real deliverance, and which seemed actually to deepen, the longer one lingered through these strange and fearful passages. A figure, partly pagan, yet the most frequently repeated of all those visible parables--the figure of one just escaped, as if from the sea, still in strengthless, surprised joy, clinging to the very verge of the shore--together with the inscription beneath it, seemed best to express the sentiment of the whole. And it was just as he had puzzled out this inscription--

*I went down to the bottom of the mountains ;
The earth with her bars was about me for ever ;
Yet hast Thou brought up my life from corruption* —that, hardly with a sense of surprise or change, Marius found himself emerging again, like a later mystic traveler through similar dark places “quieted by hope,” into the daylight.

They were still within the precincts of the house, still in possession of that wonderful singing, though almost in the open country, with a great view of the Campagna before them, and the hills beyond. The orchard or meadow, through which their path lay, was already gray in the dewy twilight, though the western sky, in which the greater stars were visible, was still afloat with ruddy splendor, seeming to repress by contrast the coloring of all earthly things, yet with the sense of a great richness lingering in their shadows. Just then the voices of the singers, a “voice of joy health,” concentrated themselves, with a solemn antistrophic movement, into an evening, or “candle” hymn—the hymn of the kindling of the lamp. It was like the evening itself, its hope and fears, and the stars shining in the midst of it, made audible. Half above, half below the level mist, which seemed to divide light from darkness (the great wild flowers of the meadow just distinguishable around her skirts, as she moved across the grass) came now the mistress of the place, the wealthy Roman matron, left early a widow by the confessor Cecilius a few years before. Arrayed in long robes with heavy, antique folds, and a veil or coif folded under the chin, "gray within gray," she seemed to Marius to have, in her temperate beauty, something of the male and serious character of the best Greek female statuary.<sup>1</sup> Very foreign, however, to any Greek statuary was the expression of pathetic care, with which she carried the child in her arms, warm within the folds of her mantle. Another little child, a year or two older, walked beside her, with the fingers of one hand bent upon her girdle. They stayed for a moment to give an evening greeting to Cornelius, as they passed.

And that visionary scene was the fitting close of the afternoon's strange experiences. A few minutes afterwards, as he was passing again upon the public road, it might have seemed a dream. The house of Cecilia grouped itself beside that other curious house he had lately visited at Tusculum. Yet what a contrast did the former present, in its suggestions of hopeful industry, of immaculate cleanness, of responsive affection!—all determined by the transporting discovery of a fact, or series of facts, in which the old puzzle of life had found its key. In truth, one of his most constant and characteristic traits had ever been the longing for escape—for sudden, relieving interchange, even upon the spaces of life, along which he had lingered most pleasantly—for a lifting, from time to time, of the actual horizon. It was like the necessity the painter is under, to put an open window or doorway in the background of his picture, which, without that, would be heavy and inanimate; or like the sick man's longing for northern coolness, and whispering willow-trees, amid the breathless and motionless evergreen forests of the south. Just in this way had that visit happened to him, through so slight an accident. Rome and Roman life, just then, had come to seem to him like a close wood of beautiful bronze-work, transformed, by some malign enchantment, out of the generations of living trees, yet with its roots in a deep, downtrodden soil of poignant human susceptibilities. In the midst of its suffocation, that old longing for escape had been satisfied by this vision of the church in Cecilia's house, as never before. It was still, indeed, according to the unchangeable law of his character, to the eye, to the visual faculty of mind, that those experiences appealed—the peaceful light and shade, the boys whose very faces seemed to sing, the virginal beauty of the mother and her children. Only, in his case, all that constituted a very real, and controlling or exigent matter, added to life, with which, according to his old maxim, he must make terms.

<sup>1</sup> "O, when mine eyes did see Olivia first,

Methought she purged the air of pestilence!"

The thirst for every kind of "experience," prompted by a philosophy which said that nothing was intrinsically great or small, had ever been at strife in him with a hieratic refinement, in which the boy-priest survived; prompting the selection, the choice, of what was perfect of its kind; and a subsequent chivalrous adherence of mind to that. That had led him along always in communion with ideals, at least half-realized in his own conditions of being, or in the actual company about him, above all, in Cornelius. Surely in this strange new society he had known for the first time to-day—in this holy family, like a fenced garden—was the fulfilment of all the judgments and preferences of that half-known friend, which of late years had been so often his protection in the perplexities of his life. Here was, it might be, if not the cure, yet the solace and anodyne of his great sorrows; of that constitutional sorrowfulness, which might be by no means peculiar to himself, but which had made his life, at all events, indeed like a long "disease of the spirit." The very air of this place seemed to come out to meet him, as if full of mercy in its mere contact; like a soothing touch to an aching limb. And yet, on the other hand, he was aware that it might awaken responsibilities—new, untried responsibilities—and demand something from him, in return. Might this new vision, like the malignant beauty of that old pagan Medusa, be exclusive of all admiring gaze on anything save itself? At least he suspected that after it he could never again be altogether as he had been before.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE MINOR "PEACE OF THE CHURCH."

FAITHFUL to the spirit of his early Epicurean philosophy and the impulse to surrender himself, in perfectly liberal inquiry about it, to anything that, as a matter of fact, attracted or impressed him strongly, Marius informed himself with much pains concerning the church in Cecilia's house; inclining at first to explain the peculiarities of that place by the establishment there of the schola or common hall of one of those burial-guilds, which at that time covered so much of the unofficial, and, as it might be called, subterranean, enterprise of Roman society.

And what he found, thus looking as it were for the dead among the living, was the vision of a natural, a scrupulously natural, love; transforming, by some new fineness of insight into the truth of human relationships, and under the urgency of some new motive by him so far unfathomable, all the conditions of life. He saw, in all its primitive freshness and amid the lively facts of its actual coming into the world, as a reality of experience, that regenerate type of humanity, which, centuries later, Giotto and his successors, down to the best and purest days of the young Raffaele, working under conditions very friendly to the imagination, were to conceive as an artistic ideal. He felt there, felt amid the stirring of some wonderful new hope within himself, the genius, the unique power of Christianity ; in exercise then, as it has been exercised ever since, in spite of many hindrances and under the most inopportune circumstances. Chastity—he seemed to understand—the chastity of men and women, with all the conditions and results proper to that chastity, is the most beautiful thing in the world, and the truest conservation of the creative energy by which men and women were first brought into it. The nature of the family, for which the better genius of old Rome itself had so sincerely cared, of the family and its appropriate affections—all that love of one's kindred by which obviously one does triumph in some degree over death—had never been so felt before. Here, surely ! in its nest-like peace and warmth, its jealous exclusion of all that was against itself and its own immaculate naturalness, in the hedge set around the sacred thing on every side, this re-institution of the family did but carry forward, and give effect to, the purposes, the kindness of nature itself, friendly to man, at all those points, more especially, where it involved (by way of due recognition of some unfathomed divine condescension, in a certain fact or series of facts) pity, and a willing sacrifice of oneself for the weak, for children and the aged, for the dead even. And then, for its constant outward token, its significant manner or index, it issued in a debonair grace, and some mystic attractiveness—a courtesy, which made Marius doubt whether, after all, that famed Greek gayety or blitheness in the handling of life, had been so great a success. In contrast with the incurable insipidity even of what was most exquisite in the higher Roman life, and still truest to the old primitive soul of goodness amid its evil, this new creation he saw (a fair picture, beyond the skill of any master of old pagan beauty) had indeed the appropriate freshness of “the bride adorned for her husband.” And still its grace was no mere simplicity. Things, new and old, seemed to be coming as if out of some goodly treasure-house, the brain full of science, and the heart rich with various sentiment, possessing withal this surprising healthfulness, this reality of heart.

“You would hardly believe,” writes Pliny to his wife, “what a longing for you possesses me. Habit—that we have not been used to be apart—adds herein to the primary force of affection. It is that keeps me awake at night fancying I see you beside me. That is why my feet take me unconsciously to your sitting-room, at those hours when I was wont to visit you there. That is why I turn from the door of the empty chamber, sad and ill-at-ease, like an excluded lover.”—

There is a real idyll from that family life, the conservation of which had been the motive of so large a part of the religion of the Romans, still surviving among them; as it survived also in the disposition and aims of Aurelius, and, in spite of slanderous tongues, in the actual sweetness of his interior life. What Marius had been permitted to see was a realization of such life higher still : and with— Yes !—with a more effective sanction or consecration than had ever been known before, in that fact, or series of facts, to be ascertained by those who would.

The chief glory of the reign of the Antonines had been, indeed, that society had attained in it, very imperfectly, and for the most part by cumbrous effort of law, many of those ends which Christianity had reached with all the sufficiency of a direct and appropriate instinct. Pagan Rome, too, had its touching charity-sermons on occasions of great public distress ; its charity-children in long file, in memory of the elder empress Faustina ; its predecessor, under patronage of Æsculapius, to the modern hospital for the sick on the island of Saint Bartholomew in the Tiber. But what pagan charity was doing tardily, and as it were with the painful calculation of old age, the church was doing, almost without thinking about it, in the plenary masterfulness of youth, because it was her very being thus to do. “ You don’t understand your own efforts,” she seems to say, to pagan virtue. She possessed herself of those efforts, and advanced them with an unparalleled liberality and largeness. The gentle Seneca would have reverent burial provided even for the dead corpse of a criminal. Yet when a certain woman gathered for interment the insulted remains of Nero, the pagan world surmised that she must be a Christian : only a Christian would have been likely to conceive so chivalrous a devotion towards wretchedness. "We refuse to be witnesses even of a homicide commanded by the laws," pleads a Christian apologist, "we take no part in your cruel sports nor in the spectacles of the amphitheater, and we hold that to witness a murder is the same thing as to commit one." And there was another duty almost forgotten, the conscience of which Rousseau stirred up in a later degenerate age. In an impassioned discourse the sophist Favorinus counsels mothers to suckle their own infants; and there are Roman epitaphs inscribed by children to their mothers which gratefully record this proof of natural affection, as a thing then unusual. And in this matter again, what a sanction, what a provocative to natural duty, lay in that image of the new Madonna, just then rising upon the world like the dawn!

Christianity had, indeed, revealed itself as the great source and motive of chastity. And this chastity, reaffirmed in all its conditions, fortified that rehabilitation of peaceful labor, after the mind, the pattern, of the workman of Galilee, which was another direct instinct of the catholic church, as indeed the long-desired initiator of a real religion of cheerfulness, and a true lover of the industry (so to term it), the labor, the creation, of God.

And that high-toned yet genial reassertion of the ideal of woman, of the family, of industry, of man's work in life, so close to the truth of nature, was also, in that charmed moment of the minor "Peace of the church," realizing itself as an influence tending to beauty, to the adornment of life and the world. The sword in the world, the right eye plucked out, the right hand cut off, the spirit of reproach which those images express, and of which monasticism is the fulfilment, reflect one side only of the nature of the divine missionary of the New Testament. Opposed to, yet blent with, this ascetic or militant character, is the image of the Good Shepherd—favorite sacred image of the primitive church—serene, blithe, and debonair, beyond the gentlest shepherd of Greek mythology; the daily food of whose spirit is the beatific vision of the kingdom of peace among men. And this latter side of the divine character of Christ, rightly understood, is the final achievement of that vein of bold and brilliant hopefulness in man, which has sustained him so far through his immense labor, his immense sorrows; and of which that peculiarly Greek gayety, in the handling of life, is but one manifestation. Sometimes one, sometimes the other, of those two contrasted aspects of the character of Christ, have, in different ages and under the urgency of different human needs, been at work also in his "mystical body." Certainly, in that brief "Peace of the church" under the Antonines, the spirit of a pastoral security and happiness seems to have been largely expanding itself. There, in the early Roman church, was to be seen, and on a basis of reasonable grounds, that long-sought serenity of satisfaction, on a dispassionate survey of the facts of life, contrasting itself for Marius, in particular, very forcibly, with the imperial philosopher's so heavy burden of unrelieved melancholy. It was Christianity in its humanity, or even in its humanism, in its generous hopefulness for man, its common sense, and alacrity of cheerful service, its sympathy with all creatures, its appreciation of beauty and daylight.

"The angel of righteousness," says the Shepherd of Hermas, the most characteristic religious book of that age, its Pilgrim's Progress—"the angel of righteousness is delicate and modest, and meek and quiet: Take from thyself grief, for (as Hamlet will one day know!) it is the sister of doubt and ill-temper: Grief is more evil than all the spirits, and is most dreadful to the servants of God, and beyond all spirits destroyeth man: For, as when good news has come to any one in grief, straightway he forgetteth his former grief, and no longer attendeth to anything except the good news which he hath heard, so do ye, also! having received a renewal of your spirit through the beholding of these good things: Put on therefore gladness that hath always favor before God, and is acceptable unto Him, and delight thyself in it; for every man that is glad doeth the things that are good, and thinketh good thoughts, despising grief."—Such were the popular utterances of this 'new people, among whom so much of what Marius had valued most in the world seemed to be under renewal; heightened and harmonized by some transforming spirit, a spirit which, in its dealing with the elements of the old world, was guided by a wonderful tact of selection, exclusion, juxtaposition ; begetting thereby a unique expression of freshness, of animation and a grave beauty, because the whole outward world of sense was understood to be but a showing-forth of the unction and royalty of an inward priesthood and kingship in the soul, among the prerogatives of which was a delightful sense of freedom.

The reader may think perhaps, that Marius, who, Epicurean as he was, had his visionary aptitudes, by an inversion of one of Plato's peculiarities with which he was of course familiar, must have descended, by fore-sight, upon a later age than his own, and anticipated the reign of Christian poetry and art under Francis of Assisi. But if he dreamed on one of those nights of the beautiful house of Cecilia, its flowers and lights, of Cecilia herself moving among the lilies, with a grace enhanced as things sometimes are in healthy dreams, it was indeed hardly an anticipation. He had lighted, by one of the peculiar intellectual good-fortunes of his life, upon a period when, even more than in the days of austere ascesis which had preceded and were to follow it, the church was true for a moment, truer perhaps than she would ever be again, to that element of profound serenity in the soul of her founder, which reflected the eternal goodwill of God to man, "in whom," according to the oldest version of the angelic message, "He is well-pleased."

For what Christianity did centuries later in the way of informing an art, a poesy, of higher and graver beauty, as some may think, than even Greek art and poetry at their best, was in truth conformable to the original tendency of its genius; miscarried, indeed, in the true dark ages, through many circumstances, of which the later persecutions it sustained, beginning with that under Aurelius himself, constituted one; the blood of martyrs ceasing at a particular period to be the true "seed of the church." The original capacity of the catholic church in this direction, amply asserted, as I have said, in the New Testament, was also really at work, in that her first early "Peace," under the Antonines—the minor "Peace of the church," as we might call it, in distinction from the final "Peace of the church," commonly so-called, under Constantine. Francis of Assisi, with his following in the sphere of poetry and the arts—the voice of Dante, the hand of Giotto—giving visible feature and color, and a palpable place among men, to the regenerate race, did but re-establish a real continuity, suspended in part by those troublesome intervening centuries, with the gracious spirit of the primitive church in that first early springtide of her prosperity: as that also is continuous with the divine happiness, the peace, of her Founder. Constantine's later "Peace," on the other hand, in many ways, does but establish the exclusiveness, the puritanism, the ascetic or monastic gloom of the church in the period between Aurelius and the first Christian emperor, soured a little by oppression and misconstruction, and driven inward upon herself in a world of tasteless controversy: the church then finally coming to terms, and effecting something more than a modus vivendi with the world, at a less fortunate moment of the world's development.<sup>1</sup>

Already, in the reign of Antoninus Pius, the time had gone by when men became Christians under the influence of some sudden overpowering impression, and with all the untranquilizing effects of such a crisis. At this period a majority perhaps had been born Christians, had been ever with peaceful hearts in their Father's house. Millenarianism—the expectation of the speedy coming of judgment—with all the consequences it involved in men's tempers, was dying out. Every day the contrast between the church and the world was becoming less trenchant. And now also, as the church rested awhile from persecution, that rapid self-development outward from within, proper to a period of peace, was in progress. Antoninus Pius indeed, far more truly than Marcus Aurelius, belonged to that group of pagan saints for whom Dante, like Augustine, has provided in his scheme of the house with many mansions. A sincere old Roman piety urged his fortunately constituted nature to no mistakes, no offenses against humanity. There was a kind of guilelessness in him, one reward of which was this singular happiness, that under his reign there was no shedding of Christian blood. To him belonged that half-humorous placidity of soul, of a kind illustrated later very effectively by Montaigne, which, starting with an instinct of mere fairness towards human nature and the world, at last actually qualifies its possessor to be almost the friend of the people of Christ. Itself, in its own nature, simple, amiable, full of a reasonable gayety, Christianity has often had its advantage of characters like that. And this geniality of Antoninus Pius, like the geniality of the old earth itself, caused the church, which is indeed no alien from that old mother earth, to expand and thrive as by natural process, under his sight. "The period of the embryogeny of Christianity," says M. Renan, "was then complete. At that date the infant is in possession of all its organs, is detached from its mother, and will live henceforward by its own proper powers of life." And the beautiful chapter of this charmed period of the church under the Antonines, up to the later years of the reign of Aurelius, contains, as one of its elements of interest, the earliest development of Christian ritual under the presidency of the church of Rome.

<sup>1</sup> Compare Mill on Liberty, page 50.

Again as in one of those quaint, mystical visions of the Shepherd of Hermas, "the aged woman, that true Sibyl, had become more and more youthful: And in the third vision she was quite young, and radiant with beauty; only her hair was that of an aged woman: And at the last she was joyous, and seated upon a throne"—seated upon a throne, "because her position is a strong one." The subterranean worship of the church properly belonged to those periods of her early history in which her worship was made penal: at other times it blossomed broadly above ground, sometimes for lengthy intervals. Hiding herself for awhile when persecution became violent, she resumed, when there was felt to be no more than ordinary danger, "her free yet modest ways." And the sort of outward prosperity which she was enjoying in the period of her first "Peace" was reinforced by the decision at this moment of a crisis in her internal history.

In the life of the church, as in all the moral life of mankind, there are two distinct ideals, either of which it is possible to follow—two conceptions, under one or the other of which we may represent to ourselves man's effort after the better life—corresponding to those two contrasted aspects, noted above, as discernible in the picture presented by the New Testament itself of the character of Christ. The ideal of Asceticism represents that moral effort as essentially a sacrifice, the sacrifice of one part of human nature to another, that it may live in what survives the more completely; while the ideal of Culture represents it as a harmonious development of all the parts of human nature, in just proportion to each other. It was to the latter order of ideas that the church, and especially the church of Rome, in this period of the Antonines, was lending herself. In this earlier "Peace" she had set up for herself the ideal of spiritual development, by an instinct, through which, in those serene moments, she was absolutely true to the peaceful soul of her Founder. "Goodwill to men," she said, "in whom God Himself is well-pleased!" For a moment, at least, there was no forced opposition between the soul and the body, the world and the spirit, and the grace of graciousness itself was pre-eminently with the people of Christ. Tact, good sense—ever the note of a true orthodoxy—the merciful compromises of the church (indicative of her imperial vocation in regard to all the varieties of human kind, with a universality of which the old Roman pastorship she was to supersede was but the prototype) had already become conspicuous, in spite of a discredited, irritating, vindictive society, all around her.

Against that divine urbanity and moderation, the old Montanism we read of dimly, was a fanatical reaction—sour, falsely anti-mundane, ever with an air of ascetic affectation, and a bigoted distaste, in particular, for all the peculiar graces of womanhood. By it, the desire to please was understood to come of the author of evil. In that interval of quietness, it was inevitable, by a law of reaction, that some such rigorism should arise. And again, it was the church of Rome especially, now becoming every day more and more the capital of the Christian world, feeling her way already to a universality of guidance in spiritual things equal to that of the earlier Rome in the political order, and part of the secret of which must be a generous tolerance of diversities, which checked the nascent puritanism of that time, and vindicated for all Christian people a cheerful liberty of heart, against many a narrow group of sectaries; all alike, in their different ways, accusers of the genial creation of God. In her full, fresh faith in the Evangele—in a real regeneration of the earth and the body, in the dignity of man's whole nature—for a moment, at least, at that critical period in the development of Christianity, she was for reason, for common sense, for fairness to human nature, for the due place of woman in the church, and, generally, for what may be called the naturalness of Christianity; as also for its comely order. It was through the bishops of Rome especially, now transforming themselves rapidly in a really catholic sense into universal pastors, that she was defining for herself this humanist path. "The dignified ecclesiastical hierarchy claimed the right of absolution, and made use of it with an ease which scandalized the puritans." And as regards those who had fallen from faith in an hour of weakness, the church of Rome, especially, elected by no means to be as the elder brother of the prodigal son, but rather to pour her oil and wine into the aching wounds.

And then, in this season of expansion, as if now at last the catholic church might venture to show her outward lineaments as they really were, worship—the beauty of holiness, nay! the elegance of sanctity—and here again under the presidency of the church of Rome, was developing, with a bold and confident gladness, such as has not been the ideal of worship in any later age of the church. The tables were turned, and the prize of a cheerful temper on a survey of life was no longer with the Greek. The æsthetic charm of the catholic church, her evocative power over all that is eloquent and expressive in the better soul of man, her outward comeliness, her dignifying convictions about human nature—all this, as abundantly realized centuries later by Dante and Giotto, by the great church-builders, by the great ritualists like Gregory, and the masters of sacred music in the middle age—we may see, in dim anticipation, in that charmed space towards the end of the second century. Dissipated, or turned aside, partly through the great mistake of Marcus Aurelius, for a short time we may discern that influence clearly predominant there. What might seem harsh as dogma was already justifying itself as worship; according to the sound rule—Lex orandi, lex credendi.

The marvelous liturgic spirit of the church, her wholly unparalleled genius for worship, being thus awake, she was rapidly reorganizing both pagan and Jewish elements of ritual, for the expanding therein of her own new heart of devotion. The ritual system of the church, which must rank as we see it in historic retrospect, like the Gothic architecture for instance, as one of the great, conjoint, and, so to term them, necessary, products of human mind, and which has ever since directed, with so deep a fascination, men's religious instincts, was then growing together, as a recognizable new treasure in the sum of things. And what has been on the whole the method of the church, as "a power of sweetness and patience," in dealing with matters like pagan art, was already manifest: it has the character of the divine moderation of Christ himself. It was only among the ignorant, only in the "villages," that Christianity, even when victorious over paganism, was really iconoclastic. In the great "Peace" under Constantine, while there was plenty of destructive fanaticism in the country, the revolution was accomplished in the large towns, following the Roman pattern, in a manner more orderly and discreet. The faithful were bent less on the destruction of the pagan temples than on the conversion of them and of their furniture to better use; and the temples became Christian sanctuaries, with much beautiful furniture ready to hand. —In hoc marmore gentilium olim incensa fumabant.

Already, in accordance with this later wisdom, that church of the minor "Peace" had adopted many of the beauties of pagan feeling and pagan custom; as being indeed a living creature, taking up, transforming, and accommodating still more closely to the human heart, what of right belonged to it. It was thus that an obscure synagogue expanded into the catholic church. Gathering, from a richer and more varied field of sound than remained for him, those old Roman harmonies, some notes of which Gregory the Great, centuries later, and after generations of interrupted development, formed into the Gregorian music, she was already, as we have seen, the house of song—of a wonderful new music and poesy. As if in anticipation of the sixteenth century, the church was becoming humanistic, in a best and earliest Renaissance. Singing there had been in abundance from the first; but often it dared only be "of the heart." It broke out, when it might, into the beginnings of a true ecclesiastical music; the Jewish psalter, which it had inherited from the synagogue, turning now, gradually, from Greek into broken Latin—into Italian; as the ritual use of the rich, fresh, expressive vernacular superseded the earlier language of the church. And through certain surviving remnants of Greek in the later Latin liturgies, we may still discern a highly interesting intermediate phase of ritual development, in which the Greek and Latin were in combination; the poor, surely—the poor and the children, of that liberal Roman church—already responding in their own “vulgar tongue,” to an office said in the original, liturgical Greek: and thus that hymn sung in the early morning, of which Pliny had heard, grew into the service of the Mass.

The Mass, indeed, would seem to have been said continuously from the time of the Apostles. Its details, as one by one they become visible in later history, have already the character of what is ancient and venerable. “We are very old, and ye are young!” they seem to protest, to those who fail to understand them. Ritual, indeed, like other elements of religion, must grow and cannot be made—grow by the same law of development which has prevailed in all the rest of the moral world. In this particular phase of the religious life, however, that development seems to have been an unusually rapid one, in the subterranean age which preceded Constantine; doubtless, there also, more especially in such time of partial reconciliation as that minor “Peace:” and in the very first days of the final triumph of the church the Mass emerges to general view already substantially complete. Thus did the liturgy of the church grow up, full of consolations for the human soul, and destined, surely, one day, under the sanction of so many ages of human experience, to take exclusive possession of the religious consciousness. "Wisdom" was dealing, as with the dust of creeds and philosophies, so also with the dust of outworn religious usage, like the very spirit of life itself, organizing souls and bodies out of the lime and clay of the earth, adopting, in a generous eclecticism, within the church's liberty and as by some providential power in her, as in other matters so in ritual, one thing here another there, from various sources—Gnostic, Jewish, Pagan—to adorn and beautify the greatest act of worship the world has seen—

Pulchrius ecce nitet renovati gloria fontis !
Cede vetus numen ! novitati cede vetustas !

CHAPTER XXIII.

SAPIENTIA ÆDIFICAVIT SIBI DOMUM.

“Wisdom hath builded herself a house : she hath mingled her wine : she hath also prepared for herself a table.”

THE great, favored ages of imaginative art present instances of the summing up of a whole world of complex associations under some single form, like the Zeus of Olympia, or the series of frescoes which commemorate the Acts of Saint Francis, at Assisi; or like the play of Hamlet or Faust. It was not in an image, or series of images, yet still in a sort of dramatic action, and with the unity of a single appeal to eye and ear, that Marius, about this time, found all his new impressions set forth, regarding what he had already recognized, intellectually, as for him, at least, the most beautiful thing in the world.

To understand the influence over him of what follows you must remember that it was an experience which came in the midst of a deep sense of vacuity in things. The fairest products of the earth seemed to be dropping to pieces, as if in men's very hands, around him; and still, how real was their sorrow, and his! “Observation of life” had come to be like the constant telling of a sorrowful rosary, day after day ; till, as if taking infection from the cloudy sorrow of the mind, the senses also, the eye itself, had grown faint and sick. And now it happened as with the actual morning on which he found himself a spectator of this new thing. The long winter had been a season of unvarying sullenness : at last, on this day he awoke at a sharp flash of lightning in the earliest twilight ; and in a little while the heavy rain had filtered the air ; the clear light was abroad ; and, as though the spring had begun with a sudden leap in the heart of things, the whole scene around him lay like an untarnished picture beneath a sky of delicate blue. Under the spell of his late depression, Marius had suddenly determined to leave Rome for awhile. But desiring first to advertise Cornelius of his movements, and failing to find him in his lodgings, he had ventured, still early in the day, to seek him in the Cecilian villa. Passing through its silent and empty courtyard he loitered for a moment, to admire. Under the clear but immature light of the winter morning after the storm, all the details of form and color in the old marbles were distinctly visible ; and with a sort of sad hardness (so it struck him), amid their beauty ; in them, and in all other details of the scene—the cypresses, the bunches of pale daffodils in the grass, the curves of the purple hills of Tusculum, with the drifts of virgin snow still lying in their hollows.

The little open door, through which he passed from the courtyard, admitted him into what was plainly the vast Lararium, or domestic sanctuary, of the Ce-cilian family, transformed in many particulars, but still richly decorated, and retaining much of its ancient furniture in costly stone and metal-work. The peculiar half-light of dawn seemed to be lingering beyond its hour upon its solemn marble walls; and here, though at that moment in absolute silence, a great company of people was assembled. In that brief period of peace (the church emerging for awhile from jealously guarded subterranean life) the severity of her earlier rule of exclusion had been somewhat relaxed; and so it came to pass that, on this morning, Marius saw for the first time the wonderful spectacle—wonderful above all in its evidential power—of those who believe.

There were noticeable, among those assembled, great varieties of rank, of age, of personal type. The Roman ingenuus, with the white toga and gold ring, stood side by side with his slave: and the air of the whole company was, above all, a grave one, an air of recollection. Coming thus unexpectedly upon this large assembly, so entirely united, in a silence so profound, for some purpose unknown to him, Marius felt for a moment as if he had stumbled by chance upon some great conspiracy. Yet that could scarcely be, for the people here collected might have figured as the earliest handsel, or pattern, of a new world, from the very face of which discontent had passed away. Corresponding to the variety of human type there present, was the various expression of every type of human sorrow assuaged. What desire, and fulfilment of desire, had wrought so pathetically in the faces of these ranks of aged men and women of humble condition? Those young men, bent down so discreetly on the details of their sacred service, had faced life and were glad, by some science, or light of knowledge they had, to which there was certainly no parallel in the older world. Was some credible message from beyond "the flaming rampart of the world"—a message of hope, regarding the place of men's souls and their interest in the sum of things—already molding their very bodies, and looks and voices, now and here? At least, there was a kindling flame at work in them, which seemed to make everything else Marius had ever known look comparatively vulgar and mean. There were the children, above all—troops of children—who reminded him of those pathetic children's graves, like cradles or garden-beds, he had noticed in his first visit to these places; and they more than satisfied the odd curiosity he had then felt about them, wondering in what quaintly expressive forms they might come forth into the daylight, if awakened from their sleep. Children of the Catacombs, some but "a span long," with features not so much beautiful as heroic (that world of new, refining sentiment having set its seal even on childhood, like everything else in Rome, naturally heroic), they retained, certainly, no spot or trace of anything subterranean this morning, in the alacrity of their worship—as ready as if they had been at their play—stretching forth their hands, crying, chanting in a resonant voice, and with boldly upturned faces, Christe Eleison!

For the silence—silence, amid those lights of early morning, to which Marius had always been constitutionally impressible, as having in them a certain reproachful austerity—was broken suddenly by resounding cries of Kyrie Eleison ! Christe Eleison ! repeated again and again alternately, until the bishop, rising from his throne, made sign that this prayer should cease. But the voices burst out again soon afterwards in a richer and more varied melody, though still antiphonal ; the men, the women and children, the deacons and the congregation, answering each other, as in a Greek chorus. But, again, with what a novelty of poetic accent ; what a genuine expansion of heart ; what profound intimations for the intellect, as the meaning of the words grew upon him ! The “hymn,” of which Pliny had heard something, had grown into this. Cum grandi affectu et compunctione dicatur—says an ancient eucharistic order ; and certainly, the mystic tone of this praying and singing was one with the expression of deliverance, of grateful assurance and sincerity, upon the faces of those assembled. As if some profound correction, and regeneration of the body by the spirit, had been begun, and already gone a great way, the countenances of men, women, and children had a brightness upon them which he could fancy reflected upon himself—an amenity, a mystic amiability and unction, which found its way, most readily of all, to the hearts of children themselves. The religious poetry of those Hebrew psalms—Benedixisti Domine terram tuam : Dixit Dominus Domino meo, sede a dextris meis—was in marvelous accord with the lyrical instinct of his own character. Those august hymns, he thought, would remain ever hereafter one of the well-tested powers among things, to soothe and fortify his soul. One could never grow tired of them !

In the old pagan worship there had been little to call out the intelligence. The eloquence of worship, which Marius found here—an eloquence, wherein there were many very various ingredients, of which that singing was only one—presented, as he gradually came to see, a fact, or series of facts, for intellectual reception. This became evident, more especially, in those lections, or sacred readings, which, like the singing, in broken vernacular Latin, occurred at certain intervals, amid the silence of the assembly. There were readings, again with bursts of chanted invocation between for fuller light on a difficult path, in which many a vagrant voice of human philosophy, haunting men's minds from of old, came sounding in clearer tones than had ever belonged to them before ; as if lifted, above their natural purpose, into the harmonies of some more masterly system of knowledge. And last of all came a narrative, in a form which every one appeared to know by heart with a thousand tender memories, and which displayed, in all the vividness of a picture for the eye, the mournful figure of him, towards whom the intention of this whole act of worship was directed—a figure which seemed to have absorbed, like a tincture of deep dyes into his vesture, all that was deep-felt and impassioned in the experiences of the past.

It was the anniversary of his birth as a little child they were celebrating to-day. Astiterunt reges terræ—proceeded the Sequence, the young men on the steps of the altar responding in deep, clear, antiphon or chorus—

Astiterunt reges terræ—

Adversus sanctum puerum tuum, Jesum :

Nunc, Domine, da servis tuis loqui verbum tuum—

Et signa fieri, per nomen sancti pueri Jesu !

And the proper action of the rite itself, like a half-opened book to be read by the duly initiated mind, took up those suggestions, and carried them on into the present, as having reference to a power still efficacious, and in action among the people there assembled, in some mystic sense. The whole office, indeed, with its interchange of lections, hymns and silences, was itself like a single piece of highly composite, dramatic music ; a “song of degrees,” rising to a climax. Notwithstanding the absence of any definite or central visible image, the entire ceremonial process, like the place in which it was enacted, seemed weighty with symbolical significance, and expressed a single leading motive. It was in the actions of one person that the whole mystery centered. Distinguished among his assistants, who stood ranged in semicircle around him (themselves parted from the general congregation by transennæ, or lattice-work, of pierced white marble) by the extreme fineness or whiteness of his vesture, and the pointed cap with golden ornaments on his head, this person, nevertheless, struck Marius as having something about him like one of the wild shepherds of the Campagna.

And yet he had never seen the pontifical character, as he conceived it—sicut unguentum in capite descendens in oram vestimenti—so fully realized, as in the expression, the voice and manner of action, of this novel pontiff, as he took his seat on the white chair placed for him by the young men, and received his long staff into his hand, or moved his hands—hands seeming to be indeed endowed with mysterious, hidden powers—at the Lavabo, or at the various benedictions, or to bless certain objects on the table before him, chanting in cadence of a grave sweetness the leading parts of the rite. What profound unction and mysticity! The solemnity of the singing was at its height when he opened his lips. It was as if, a new sort of rhapsôdos, he alone possessed the words of the office, and they were flowing fresh from some source of inspiration within him. The table or altar at which he presided, below a canopy of spiral columns, and with the carved palm-branch, standing in the midst of a semicircle of seats for the priests, was in reality the tomb of a youthful “witness,” of the family of the Cecilii, who had shed his blood not many years before, and whose relics were still in this place. It was for his sake that the bishop put his lips so often to the surface before him; the regretful memory of this death intertwinning itself, though with a note of triumph, as a matter of special inward significancy, throughout this whole service, which was, besides other things, a commemoration of the whole number of the beloved dead.

It was a sacrifice also, in its essence—a sacrifice, it might seem, like the most primitive, natural, and enduringly significant, of old pagan sacrifices, of the simplest fruits of the earth. And in connection with this circumstance again, as in the actual stones of the building so in the rite itself, it was not so much a new matter, as a new spirit which Marius observed, molding, informing, with a new intention, many observances which he did not witness now for the first time. Men and women came to the altar successively, in perfect order; and deposited there, below the marble lattice, their baskets filled with wheat and grapes, their incense, and oil for the lamps of the sanctuary; bread and wine especially—pure wheaten bread, and the pure white wine of the Tusculan vineyards. It was a veritable consecration, hopeful and animating, of the earth's gifts, of all that we can touch and see—of old dead and dark matter itself, somehow redeemed at last, in the midst of a jaded world that had lost the true sense of it, and in strong contrast to the wise emperor's renunciant and impassive attitude towards it. Certain portions of that bread and wine were selected by the bishop; and thereafter it was with an increasing mysticity and effusion that the rite proceeded. Like an invocation or supplication, full of a powerful in-breathing or empneusis—the antiphonal singing developed, from this point, into a kind of solemn dialogue between the chief ministrant and the whole assisting company—

SURSUM CORDA !

HABEMUS AD DOMINUM.

GRATIAS AGAMUS DOMINO DEO NOSTRO!—

It was the service, especially, of young men, standing there, in long ranks, arrayed in severe and simple vesture of pure white—a service in which they would seem to be flying for refuge (with their youth itself, as a treasure in their hands to be preserved) to one like themselves, whom they were also ready to worship ; to worship, above all in the way of Aurelius, by imitation and conformity to his image. Adoramus te Christe, quia per crucem tuam redemisti mundum !—they cried together. So deep was the emotion, that, at moments, it seemed to Marius as if some at least there present perceived the very object of all this pathetic crying himself drawing near. Throughout the rite there had been a growing sense and assurance of one coming—Yes! actually with them now ; according to the oft-repeated prayer or affirmation, Dominus vobiscum ! Some at least were quite sure of it : and the confidence of this remnant fired the hearts, and gave meaning to the bold, ecstatic worship, of all the rest about them.

Helped especially by the suggestions of that mysterious old Hebrew psalmody, to him so new—lection and hymn—and catching therewith a portion of the enthusiasm of those around him, Marius could discern dimly, behind the solemn recitation which now followed (at once a narrative and an invocation or prayer) the most touching image he had ever beheld. It was the image of a young man giving up, one by one, for the greatest of ends, the greatest gifts ; parting with himself, and, above all, with the serenity, the deep and divine serenity, of his own mind ; yet, from the midst of his distress, crying out upon the greatness of his success, as if foreseeing this very worship. As the center of the supposed facts, which for these people had become so constraining a motive of activity and hope, this image seemed to propose itself with an overwhelming claim on human gratitude. What Saint Lewis of France discerned, and found so irresistibly touching, through the dimness of many centuries, as a painful thing done for love of him by one he had never seen, was, to them, a thing of yesterday ; and their hearts were whole with it : it had the force, among their interests, of an almost recent event in the career of one whom their fathers' fathers might have known. From memories so sublime, yet so close to them, had the narration descended in which these acts of worship centered ; and again the names of the more recent dead were mingled with it. And it seemed as if the very dead were aware ; to be stirring beneath the slabs of the sepulchers which lay so near, that they might associate themselves to that enthusiasm—to that exalted worship of Jesus.

One by one, the faithful approached, and received from the chief ministrant portions of the great, white, wheaten cake, he had taken into his hands—Perducat vos ad vitam æternam ! —he prays, half-silently, as they depart again, after discreet embraces. The Eucharist of those early days was, even more completely than at any later or happier time, an act of thanksgiving ; and while what remained was borne away for the reception of the sick, the sustained gladness of the rite reached its highest point in the singing of a hymn : a hymn which was as the spontaneous product of two opposed companies or powers, yet contending accordantly together, accumulating and heightening their witness, and provoking each other's worship, in a kind of sacred rivalry.

Ite ! missa est ! —cried the young deacons : and Marius departed from that strange scene with the rest. What was this ? —Was this what made the way of Cornelius so pleasant through the world ? As for himself : the natural soul of worship in him had at last been satisfied as never before. He felt, as he left that place, that he must often hereafter experience a longing memory, a kind of thirst, for all that, over again. Moreover, it seemed to define what he must require of the powers, whatsoever they might be, that had brought him into the world at all, to make him not unhappy in it.

CHAPTER XXIV.

A CONVERSATION NOT IMAGINARY.

IN cheerfulness is the success of our studies, says Pliny—studia hilaritate proveniunt. It was still the habit of Marius, encouraged by his experience that sleep is not only a sedative but the best of stimulants, to seize the morning hours for creation, making profit when he might of the wholesome serenity which followed a dreamless night. “The morning for creation,” he would say ; “afternoon for the perfecting labor of the file ; the evening for reception—the reception of matter from without one, of other men’s words and thoughts—matter for our own dreams, or the merely mechanic exercise of the brain, brooding thereon silently, in its dark chambers.” It was therefore a rare thing for him to leave home early in the day. One day he had been induced to do so, on the occasion of a visit to Rome of the famous writer Lucian, whom he had been bidden to meet. The breakfast over, he walked away with the learned guest, having offered to be his guide to the lecture-room of a well-known Greek rhetorician and expositor of the Stoic philosophy, a teacher then much in fashion among the studious youth of Rome.

On reaching the place, however, they found the doors closed, with a slip of writing attached, which proclaimed "a holiday;" and the morning being a fine one, they strolled further, along the Appian Way. Mortality, with which the Queen of Ways—in reality the favorite cemetery of Rome—was so closely crowded, in every imaginable form of sepulcher, from the tiniest baby-house, to the massive towers out of which the Middle Ages would adapt a fortress, might seem, on a morning like this, to be "smiling through tears." The flower-stalls just beyond the city gates presented to view an array of garlands and posies, fresh enough for a wedding. At one and another of them groups of persons, gravely clad, were making their bargains before starting off to a perhaps distant spot on the highway, to keep a dies rosationis (as this was the time of roses) at the grave of a deceased relation. Here and there, an actual funeral procession was slowly on its way, in weird contrast to the gayety of the hour.

The two companions, of course, read the epitaphs as they strolled along. In one, reminding them of the poet's—Si lacrimæ prosunt, visis te ostende videri!—a woman prayed that her lost husband might visit her dreams. Their characteristic note, indeed, was an imploring cry, still to be sought after by the living. "While I live," was the promise of a lover to his dead mistress, "you will receive this homage: after my death,—who can tell?"—post mortem nescio. "If ghosts, my sons, do feel anything after death, my sorrow will be lessened by your frequent coming to me here !”—“ This is a privileged tomb ; to my family and descendants has been conceded the right of visiting this place as often as they please.”—“ This is an eternal habitation ; here lie I ; here I shall lie for ever.”—“ Reader ! if you doubt that the soul survives, make your oblation and a prayer for me ; and you shall understand ! ”

The elder of the two readers, certainly, was little affected by those pathetic suggestions. It was long ago that having visited the banks of the Padus, and asked in vain for the poplars which were the sisters of Phaethon, and whose tears were amber, he had once for all arranged for himself a view of the world which excluded all reference to what might lie beyond its “ flaming barriers.” And at the age of sixty he had no misgivings. His elegant and self-complacent, but far from unamiable, skepticism, long since brought to perfection, never failed him. It surrounded him, as some are surrounded by a magic ring of fine aristocratic manners, with “ a rampart,” through which he himself never broke, nor permitted any thing or person to break upon him. Gay, animated, content with his old age as it was, the aged student still took a lively interest in studious youth.—Could Marius inform him of any such, now known to him in Rome ? What did the young men learn, just then ? and how ?

In answer, Marius became fluent concerning the promise of one young student, the son, as it presently appeared, of parents of whom Lucian himself knew something : and soon afterwards the lad was seen coming along briskly—a lad with gait and figure well enough expressive of the sane mind in the healthy body, though a little slim and worn of feature, and with a pair of eyes expressly designed, it might seem, for fine glancings at the stars. At the sight of Marius he paused suddenly, and with a modest blush on recognizing his companion, who straightway took with the youth, so prettily enthusiastic, the freedom of an old friend.

In a few moments the three were seated together, immediately above the fragrant borders of a rose-farm, on the marble bench of one of the exhedrae for the use of foot-passengers at the roadside, from which they could overlook the grand, earnest prospect of the Campagna, and enjoy the air. Fancying that the lad's plainly written enthusiasm had induced in the elder speaker a somewhat greater fervor than was usual with him, Marius listened to the conversation which follows—

“Ah! Hermotimus! Hurrying to lecture!—if I may judge by your pace, and that volume in your hand. You were thinking hard as you came along, moving your lips and waving your arm: some fine speech you were pondering, some knotty question or viewy doctrine—not to be idle for a moment, to be making progress in philosophy, even on your way to the schools. To-day, however, you need go no further. We read a notice at the schools that there would be no lecture. Stay therefore, and talk awhile with us.

—With pleasure, Lucian.—Yes! I was ruminating yesterday's conference. One must not lose a moment. Life is short and art is long! And it was of the art of medicine, that was first said—a thing so much easier than divine philosophy, to which one can hardly attain in a lifetime, unless one be ever wakeful, ever on the watch. And here the hazard is no little one—By the attainment of a true philosophy to attain happiness; or, having missed both, to perish, as one of the vulgar herd.

—The prize is a great one, Hermotimus! and you must needs be near it, after these months of toil, and with that scholarly pallor of yours. Unless, indeed, you have already laid hold upon it, and kept us in the dark.

—How could that be, Lucian? Happiness, 'as Hesiod says, abides very far hence; and the way to it is long and steep and rough. I see myself still at the beginning of my journey; still but at the mountain's foot. I am trying with all my might to get forward. What I need is a hand, stretched out to help me.

—And is not the master sufficient for that? Could he not, like Zeus in Homer, let down to you, from that high place, a golden cord, to draw you up thither, to himself and to that Happiness, to which he ascended so long ago?

—The very point, Lucian! If it had depended on him I should long ago have been caught up. 'Tis I am wanting.

—Well! keep your eye fixed on the journey's end, and the happiness there above, with confidence in his goodwill.

—Ah! there are many who start cheerfully on the journey and proceed a certain distance, but lose heart when they light on the obstacles of the way. Only, those who endure to the end do come to the mountain's top, and thereafter live in Happiness:—live a wonderful manner of life, seeing all other people from that great height no bigger than tiny ants.

—What little fellows you make of us—less than the pygmies—down in the dust here. Well! we, 'the vulgar herd,' as we creep along, will not forget you in our prayers, when you are seated up there above the clouds, whither you have been so long hastening. But tell me, Hermotimus!—when do you expect to arrive there?

—Ah! that I know not. In twenty years, perhaps, I shall be really on the summit.—A great while! you think. But then, again, the prize I contend for is a great one.

—Perhaps! But as to those twenty years—that you will live so long.—Has the master assured you of that? Is he a prophet as well as a philosopher? For I suppose you would not endure all this, upon a mere chance—toiling day and night, though it might happen that just ere the last step, Destiny seized you by the foot and plucked you thence, with your hope still unfulfilled.

—Hence, with these ill-omened words, Lucian!

Were I to survive but for a day, I should be happy, having once attained wisdom.

—How?—Satisfied with a single day, after all those labors?

—Yes! one blessed moment were enough!

—But again, as you have never been thither, how know you that happiness is to be had up there, at all—the happiness that is to make all this worth while?

—I believe what the master tells me. Of a certainty he knows, being now far above all others.

—And what was it he told you about it? Is it riches, or glory, or some indescribable pleasure?

—Hush! my friend! All those are nothing in comparison of the life there!

—What, then, shall those who come to the end of this discipline—what excellent thing shall they receive, if not these?

—Wisdom, the absolute goodness and the absolute beauty, with the sure and certain knowledge of all things—how they are. Riches and glory and pleasure—whatsoever belongs to the body—they have cast from them: stripped bare of all that, they mount up, even as Hercules, consumed in the fire, became a god. He too cast aside all that he had of his earthly mother, and bearing with him the divine element, pure and undefiled, winged his way to heaven from the discerning flame. Even so do they, detached from all that others prize, by the burning fire of a true philosophy, ascend to the highest degree of happiness.

—Strange! And do they never come down again from the heights to help those whom they left below? Must they, when they be once come thither, there remain forever, laughing, as you say, at what other men prize?

—More than that! They whose initiation is entire are subject no longer to anger, fear, desire, regret. Nay! They scarcely feel at all.

—Well! as you have leisure to-day, why not tell an old friend in what way you first started on your philosophic journey? For, if I might, I should like to join company with you from this very day.

—If you be really willing, Lucian! you will learn in no long time your advantage over all other people. They will seem but as children, so far above them will be your thoughts.

—Well! Be you my guide! It is but fair. But tell me—Do you allow learners to contradict, if anything is said which they don't think right!

—No, indeed! Still, if you wish, oppose your questions. In that way you will learn more easily.

—Let me know, then—Is there one only way which leads to a true philosophy—your own way—the way of the Stoics: or is it true, as I have heard, that there are many ways of approaching it?

—Yes! Many ways! There are the Stoics, and the Peripatetics, and those who call themselves after Plato: there are the enthusiasts for Diogenes, and Antisthenes, and the followers of Pythagoras, besides others.

—It was true, then. But again, is what they say the same or different?

—Very different.

—Yet the truth, I conceive, would be one and the same, from all of them. Answer me then—In what, or whom, did you confide when you first betook yourself to philosophy, and seeing so many doors open to you, passed them all by and went in to the Stoics, as if there alone lay the way of truth? What token had you? Forget, please, all you are to-day—halfway, or more, on the philosophic journey: answer me as you would have done then, a mere outsider as I am now.

—Willingly! It was there the great majority went! 'Twas by that I judged it to be the better way.

—A majority how much greater than the Epicureans, the Platonists, the Peripatetics? You, doubtless, counted them respectively, as with the votes in a scrutiny.

—No! But this was not my only motive. I heard it said by every one that the Epicureans were soft and voluptuous, the Peripatetics avaricious and quarrelsome, and Plato's followers puffed up with pride. But of the Stoics, not a few pronounced that they were true men, that they knew everything, that theirs was the royal road, the one road, to wealth, to wisdom, to all that can be desired.

—Of course those who said this were not themselves Stoics: you would not have believed them—still less their opponents. They were the vulgar, therefore.

—True ! But you must know that I did not trust to others exclusively. I trusted also to myself—to what I saw. I saw the Stoics going through the world after a seemly manner, neatly clad, never in excess, always collected, ever faithful to the mean which all pronounce golden.

—You are trying an experiment on me. You would fain see how far you can mislead me as to your real ground. The kind of probation you describe is applicable, indeed, to works of art, which are rightly judged by their appearance to the eye. There is something in the comely form, the graceful drapery, which tells surely of the hand of Pheidias or Alcamenes. But if philosophy is to be judged by outward appearances, what would become of the blind man, for instance, unable to observe the attire and gait of your friends the Stoics ?

—It was not of the blind I was thinking.

—Yet there must needs be some common criterion in a matter so important to all. Put the blind, if you will, beyond the privileges of philosophy ; though they perhaps need that inward vision more than all others. But can those who are not blind, be they as keen-sighted as you will, collect a single fact of mind from a man's attire, from anything outward ?—Understand me ! You attached yourself to these men—did you not ?—because of a certain love you had for the mind in them, the thoughts they had, desiring the mind in you to be improved thereby ?

—Assuredly !

—How, then, did you find it possible, by the sort of signs you just now spoke of, to distinguish the true philosopher from the false? Matters of that kind are not wont so to reveal themselves. They are but hidden mysteries, hardly to be guessed at through the words and acts which may in some sort be conformable to them. You, however, it would seem, can look straight into the heart in men's bosoms, and acquaint yourself with what really passes there.

—You are making sport of me, Lucian! In truth, it was with God's help I made my choice, and I don't repent it.

—And still you refuse to tell me, to save me from perishing in that 'vulgar herd.'

—Because nothing I can tell you would satisfy you.

—You are mistaken, my friend! But since you deliberately conceal the thing, grudging me, as I suppose, that true philosophy which would make me equal to you, I will try, if it may be, to find out for myself the exact criterion in these matters—how to make a perfectly safe choice. And, do you listen.

—I will; there may be something worth knowing in what you will say.

—Well!--only don't laugh if I seem a little fumbling in my efforts. The fault is yours, in refusing to share your lights with me. Let Philosophy, then, be like a city—a city whose citizens within it are a happy people, as your master would tell you, having lately come thence, as we suppose. All the virtues are theirs, and they are little less than gods. Those acts of violence which happen among us are not to be seen in their streets. They live together in one mind, very seemly ; the things which beyond anything else cause men to contend against each other, having no place among them. Gold and silver, pleasure, vainglory, they have long since banished, as being unprofitable to the commonwealth ; and their life is an unbroken calm, in liberty, equality, an equal happiness.

—And is it not reasonable that all men should desire to be of a city such as that, and take no account of the length and difficulty of the way thither, so only they may one day become its freemen ?

—It might well be the business of life :—leaving all else, forgetting one's native country here, unmoved by the tears, the restraining hands, of parents or children, if one had them—only bidding them follow the same road ; and if they would not or could not, shaking them off, leaving one's very garment in their hands if they took hold on us, to start off straightway for that happy place ! For there is no fear, I suppose, of being shut out if one came thither naked. I remember, indeed, long ago an aged man related to me how things passed there, offering himself to be my leader, and enroll me on my arrival in the number of the citizens. I was but fifteen—certainly very foolish : and it may be that I was then actually within the suburbs, or at the very gates, of the city. Well, this aged man told me, among other things, that all the citizens were wayfarers from afar. Among them were barbarians and slaves, poor men—ay! and cripples—all indeed who truly desired that citizenship. For the only legal conditions of enrolment were—not wealth, nor bodily beauty, nor noble ancestry—things not named among them—but intelligence, and the desire for moral beauty, and earnest labor. The last comer, thus qualified, was made equal to the rest: master and slave, patrician, plebeian, were words they had not—in that blissful place. And believe me, if that blissful, that beautiful place, were set on a hill visible to all the world, I should long ago have journeyed thither. But, as you say, it is far off: and one must needs find out for oneself the road to it, and the best possible guide. And I find a multitude of guides, who press on me their services, and protest, all alike, that they have themselves come thence. Only, the roads they propose are many, and towards adverse quarters. And one of them is steep and stony, and through the beating sun; and the other is through green meadows, and under grateful shade, and by many a fountain of water. But howsoever the road may be, at each one of them stands a credible guide; he puts out his hand and would have you come his way. All other ways are wrong, all other guides false. Hence my difficulty!—The number and variety of the ways! For you know, There is but one road that leads to Corinth.

—Well! If you go the whole round, you will find no better guides than those. If you wish to get to Corinth, you will follow the traces of Zeno and Chrysippus. It is impossible otherwise.

—Yes! The old, familiar language! Were one of Plato's fellow-pilgrims here, or a follower of Epicurus—or fifty others—each would tell me that I should never get to Corinth except in his company. One must therefore credit all alike, which would be absurd; or, what is far safer, distrust all alike, until one has discovered the truth. Suppose now, that, being as I am, ignorant which of all philosophers is really in possession of truth, I chose your sect, relying on yourself—my friend, indeed, yet still acquainted only with the way of the Stoics: and that then some divine power brought Plato, and Aristotle, and Pythagoras, and the others, back to life again. Well! They would come round about me, and put me on my trial for my presumption, and say—‘In whom was it you confided when you preferred Zeno and Chrysippus to me?—and me?—masters of far more venerable age than those, who are but of yesterday; and though you have never held any discussion with us, nor made trial of our doctrine? It is not thus that the law would have judges do—listen to one party and refuse to let the other speak for himself. If judges act thus, there may be an appeal to another tribunal.’ What should I answer? Would it be enough to say—‘I trusted my friend Hermotimus?’—‘We know not Hermotimus, nor he us,’ they would tell me; adding, with a smile, ‘your friend thinks he may believe all our adversaries say of us, whether in ignorance or in malice.’

Yet if he were umpire in the games, and if he happened to see one of our wrestlers, by way of a preliminary exercise, knock to pieces an antagonist of mere empty air, he would not thereupon pronounce him a victor. Well! don't let your friend Hermotimus suppose, in like manner, that his teachers have really prevailed over us in those battles of theirs, fought with our mere shadows. That, again, were to be like children, lightly overthrowing their own card-castles; or like boy-archers, who cry out when they hit the target of straw. The Persian and Scythian bowmen, as they speed along, can pierce a bird on the wing.'

—Let us leave Plato and the others at rest. It is not for me to contend against them. Let us rather search out together if the truth of Philosophy be as I say. Why summon the athletes, and archers from Persia?

—Yes! let them go, if you think them in the way. And now do you speak! You really look as if you had something wonderful to deliver.

—Well then, Lucian! to me it seems quite possible for one who has learned the doctrines of the Stoics only, to attain from those a knowledge of the truth, without proceeding to inquire into all the various tenets of the others. Look at the question in this way. If one told you that twice two make four, would it be necessary for you to go the whole round of the arithmeticians, to see whether any one of them will say that twice two make five, or seven?

Would you not see at once that the man tells the truth?

—At once.

—Why then do you find it impossible that one who has fallen in with the Stoics only, in their enunciation of what is true, should adhere to them, and seek after no others; assured that four could never be five, even if fifty Platos, fifty Aristotles said so?

—You are beside the point, Hermotimus! You are likening open questions to principles universally received. Have you ever met any one who said that twice two make five, or seven?

—No! only a madman would say that.

—And have you ever met, on the other hand, a Stoic and an Epicurean who were agreed upon the beginning and the end, the principle and the final cause, of things? Never! Then your parallel is false. We are inquiring to which of the sects philosophic truth belongs, and you seize on it by anticipation, and assign it to the Stoics, alleging, what is by no means clear, that it is they for whom twice two make four. But the Epicureans, or the Platonists, might say that it is they, in truth, who make two and two equal four, while you make them five or seven. Is it not so, when you think virtue the only good, and the Epicureans pleasure; when you hold all things to be material, while the Platonists admit something im-material? As I said, you resolve off-hand, in favor of the Stoics, the very point which needs a critical decision. If it is clear beforehand that the Stoics alone make two and two equal four, then the others must hold their peace. But so long as that is the very point of debate, we must listen to all sects alike, or be well-assured that we shall seem but partial in our judgment.

—I think, Lucian! that you do not altogether understand my meaning. To make it clear, then, let us suppose that two men have entered a temple, of Æsculapius—say; or Bacchus: and that afterwards one of the sacred vessels is found to be missing. And the two men must be searched to see which of them has hidden it under his garment. For it is certainly in the possession of one or the other of them. Well! if it be found on the first there will be no need to search the second; if it is not found on the first, then the other must have it; and again, there will be no need to search him.

—Yes! So let it be.

—And we too, Lucian! if we have found the holy vessel in possession of the Stoics shall no longer have need to search other philosophers, having attained that we were seeking. Why trouble ourselves further?

—No need, if something had indeed been found, and you knew it to be that lost thing: if, at the least, you could recognize the sacred object when you saw it. But truly, as the matter now stands, not two persons only have entered the temple, one or the other of whom must needs have taken the golden cup, but a whole crowd of persons. And then, it is not clear what the lost object really is—cup, or flagon, or diadem; for one of the priests avers this, another that ; they are not even in agreement as to its material : some will have it to be of brass, others of silver, or gold. It thus becomes necessary to search the garments of all persons who have entered the temple, if the lost vessel is to be recovered. And if you find a golden cup on the first of them, it will still be necessary to proceed in searching the garments of the others ; for it is not certain that this cup really belonged to the temple. Might there not be many such golden vessels ?—No ! we must go on to every one of them, placing all that we find in the midst together, and then make our guess which of all those things may fairly be supposed to be the property of the god. For, again, this circumstance adds greatly to our difficulty, that without exception every one searched is found to have something upon him—cup, or flagon, or diadem, of brass, of silver, of gold : and still, all the while, it is not ascertained which of all those is the sacred thing : and you must still hesitate to pronounce any one of them guilty of the sacrilege—those objects may be their own lawful property : one cause of all this obscurity being, as I think, that there was no inscription on the lost cup, if cup it was. Had the name of the god, or even that of the donor, been upon it, we should at least have had less trouble, and having detected the inscription we should have ceased to trouble any one else by our search.

—I have nothing to reply to that.

—Hardly anything plausible. So that if we wish to find who it is has the sacred vessel, or who will be our best guide to Corinth, we must needs proceed to every one and examine him with the utmost care, stripping off his garment and considering him closely. Scarcely, even so, shall we come at the truth. And if we are to have a credible adviser regarding this question of philosophy—which of all philosophies one ought to follow—he alone who is acquainted with the dicta of every one of them can be such a guide: all others must be inadequate. I would give no credence to them if they lacked information as to one only. If some one introduced a fair person and told us he was the fairest of all men, we should not believe that, unless we knew that he had seen all the people in the world. Fair he might be; but, fairest of all—none could know, unless he had seen all. And we too desire, not a fair one, but the fairest of all. Unless we find him, we shall think we have failed. It is no casual beauty that will content us; what we are seeking after is that supreme beauty which must of necessity be unique.

—What then is one to do, if the matter be really thus? Perhaps you know better than I. All I see is that very few of us would have time to examine all the various sects of philosophy in turn, even if we began in early life. I know not how it is; but though you seem to me to speak reasonably, yet (I must confess it) you have distressed me not a little by this exact exposition of yours. I was unlucky in coming out to-day, and in my falling in with you, who have thrown me into utter perplexity by your proof that the discovery of truth is impossible. just as I seemed to be on the point of attaining my hope.

—Blame your parents, my child, not me! Or rather, blame mother Nature herself, for giving us but seventy or eighty years instead of making us as long-lived as Tithonus. For my part, I have but led you from premise to conclusion.

—Nay! you are a mocker! I know not wherefore, but you have a grudge against philosophy; and it is your entertainment to make a jest of her lovers.

—Ah! Hermotimus! what the Truth may be, you philosophers may be able to tell better than I. But so much at least I know of her, that she is one by no means pleasant to those who hear her speak: in the matter of pleasantness, she is far surpassed by Falsehood: and Falsehood has the pleasanter countenance. She, nevertheless, being conscious of no alloy within, discourses with boldness to all men, who therefore have little love for her. See how angry you are now because I have stated the truth about certain things of which we are both alike enamored—that they are hard to come by. It is as if you had fallen in love with a statue and hoped to win its favor, thinking it a human creature; and I, understanding it to be but an image of brass or stone, had shown you, as a friend, that your love was impossible, and thereupon you had conceived that I bore you some ill-will.

—But still, does it not follow from what you said, that we must renounce philosophy and pass our days in idleness?

—When did you hear me say that? I did but assert that if we are to seek after philosophy, whereas there are many ways professing to lead thereto, we must with much exactness distinguish them.

—Well, Lucian! that we must go to all the schools in turn, and test what they say, if we are to choose the right one, is perhaps reasonable; but surely ridiculous, unless we are to live as many years as the Phoenix, to be so lengthy in the trial of each; as if it were not possible to learn the whole by the part! They say that Pheidias, when he was shown one of the talons of a lion, computed the stature and age of the animal it belonged to, modeling a complete lion upon the standard of a single part of it. You too would recognize a human hand were the rest of the body concealed. Even so with the schools of philosophy:—the leading doctrines of each might be learned in an afternoon. That over-exactness of yours, which requires so long a time, is by no means necessary for making the better choice.

—You are forcible, Hermotimus! with this theory of The Whole by the Part. Yet, methinks, I heard you but now propound the contrary. But tell me; would Pheidias when he saw the lion's talon have known that it was a lion's, if he had never seen the animal? Surely, the cause of his recognizing the part was his knowledge of the whole. There is a way of choosing one's philosophy even less troublesome than yours. Put the names of all the philosophers into an urn. Then call a little child, and let him draw the name of the philosopher you shall follow all the rest of your days.

—Nay! be serious with me. Tell me; did you ever buy wine?

—Surely.

—And did you first go the whole round of the wine-merchants, tasting and comparing their wines?

—By no means.

—No! You were contented to order the first good wine you found at your price. By tasting a little you ascertained the quality of the whole cask. How if you had gone to each of the merchants in turn, and said, ‘I wish to buy a cotylé of wine. Let me drink out the whole cask. Then I shall be able to tell which is best, and where I ought to buy.’ Yet this is what you would do with the philosophies. Why drain the cask when you might taste, and see?

—How slippery you are; how you escape from one’s fingers! Still, you have given me an advantage, and are in your own trap.

—How so?

—Thus! You take a common object known to every one, and make wine the figure of a thing which presents the greatest variety in itself, and about which all men are at variance, because it is an unseen and difficult thing. I hardly know wherein philosophy and wine are alike unless it be in this, that the philosophers exchange their ware for money like the wine-merchants; some of them with a mixture of water or worse, or giving short measure.

However, let us consider your parallel. The wine in the cask, you say, is of one kind throughout. But have the philosophers—has your own master even—but one and the same thing only to tell you, every day and all days, on a subject so manifold? Otherwise, how can you know the whole by the tasting of one part? The whole is not the same—Ah! and it may be that God has hidden the good wine of philosophy at the bottom of the cask. You must drain it to the end if you are to find those drops of divine sweetness you seem so much to thirst for! Yourself, after drinking so deeply, are still but at the beginning, as you said. But is not philosophy rather like this? Keep the figure of the merchant and the cask: but let it be filled, not with wine, but with every sort of grain. You come to buy. The merchant hands you a little of the wheat which lies at the top. Could you tell by looking at that, whether the chick-peas were clean, the lentils tender, the beans full? And then, whereas in selecting our wine we risk only our money; in selecting our philosophy we risk ourselves, as you told me—might ourselves sink into the dregs of ‘the vulgar herd.’ Moreover, while you may not drain the whole cask of wine by way of tasting, Wisdom grows no less by the depth of your drinking. Nay! if you take of her, she is increased thereby.

And then there is another similitude I have to propose, as regards this tasting of philosophy. Don’t think that I blaspheme her if I say that it may be as with some deadly poison, hemlock or aconite. These too, though they cause death, yet kill not if one tastes but a minute portion. You would suppose that the tiniest particle must be sufficient.

—Be it as you will, Lucian! One must live a hundred years—one must sustain all this labor—otherwise, philosophy is unattainable.

—Not so! Though there were nothing strange in that; if it be true, as you said at first, that Life is short and art is long. But now, you take it hard that we are not to see you this very day, before the sun goes down, a Chrysippus, a Pythagoras, a Plato.

—You overtake me, Lucian! and drive me into a corner; I believe, in jealousy of heart, because I have made some progress in doctrine whereas you have neglected yourself.

—Well! Don't attend to me! Treat me as a Corybant, a fanatic: and do you go forward on this road of yours. Finish the journey in accordance with the view you had of these matters at the beginning of it. Only, be assured that my judgment on it will remain unchanged. Reason still says, that without criticism, without a clear, exact, unbiassed intelligence to try them, all those theories—all things—will have been seen in vain. 'To that end,' she tells us, 'much time is necessary, many delays of judgment, a cautious gait, repeated inspection.' And we are not to regard the outward appearance, or the reputation of wisdom, in any of the speakers; but like the judges of Areopagus, who try their causes in the darkness of the night, look only to what they say.

—Philosophy, then, is impossible, or possible only in another life!

—Hermotimus! I grieve to tell you that all that even may be found insufficient. After all, we may deceive ourselves in the belief that we have found something:—like the fishermen! Again and again they let down the net. At last they feel something heavy, and with vast labor draw up, not a load of fish, but only a pot full of sand, or a great stone.

—I don't understand what you mean by the net. It is plain that you have caught me in it.

—Try to get out! You can swim as well as another. We may go to all philosophers in turn and make trial of them. Still, I for my part, hold it by no means certain that any one of them really possesses what we seek. The truth may be a thing that not one of them has found. You have twenty beans in your hand, and you bid ten persons guess how many: one says five, another fifteen; it is possible that one of them may tell the true number; but it is not impossible that all may be wrong. So it is with the philosophers. All alike are in search of Happiness—what kind of thing it is. One says one thing, one another: it is pleasure; it is virtue;—what not? And Happiness may indeed be one of those things. But it is possible also that it may be still something else, different and distinct from them all.

—What is that?—There is something, I know not how, very sad and disheartening in what you say.

We seem to have come round in a circle to the spot whence we started, and to our first incertitude. Ah! Lucian, what have you done to me? You have proved my priceless pearl to be but ashes, and all my past labor to have been in vain.

—Reflect, my friend, that you are not the first person who has thus failed of the good thing he hoped for. All philosophers, so to speak, are but fighting about the ‘ass’s shadow.’ To me you seem like one who should weep, and reproach fortune because he is not able to climb up into heaven, or go down into the sea by Sicily and come up at Cyprus, or sail on wings in one day from Greece to India. And the true cause of his trouble is that he has based his hope on what he has seen in a dream, or his own fancy has put together; without previous thought whether what he desires is in itself attainable and within the compass of human nature. Even so, methinks, has it happened with you. As you dreamed, so largely, of those wonderful things, came Reason, and woke you up from sleep, a little roughly: and then you are angry with Reason, your eyes being still but half open, and find it hard to shake off sleep for the pleasure of what you saw therein. Only, don’t be angry with me, because, as a friend, I would not suffer you to pass your life in a dream, pleasant perhaps, but still only a dream—because I wake you up and demand that you should busy yourself with the proper business of life, and send you to it possessed of common sense. What your soul was full of just now is not very different from those

Gorgons and Chimæras and the like, which the poets and the painters construct for us, fancy-free :—things which never were, and never will be, though many believe in them, and all like to see and hear of them, just because they are so strange and odd.

And you too, methinks, having heard from some such maker of marvels of a certain woman of a fairness beyond nature—beyond the Graces, beyond Venus Urania herself—asked not if he spoke truth, and whether this woman be really alive in the world, but straightway fell in love with her; as they say that Medea was enamored of Jason in a dream. And what more than anything else seduced you into that passion, and others like you, for a vain idol of the fancy, is, that he who told you about that fair woman, from the very moment when you first believed that what he said was true, brought forward all the rest in consequent order. Upon her alone your eyes were fixed; by her he led you along, when once you had given him a hold upon you—led you along the straight road, as he said, to the beloved one. All was easy after that. None of you asked again whether it was the true way; following one after another, like sheep led by the green bough in the hand of the shepherd. He moved you hither and thither with his finger, as easily as water spilt on a table!

My friend! Be not so lengthy in preparing the banquet, lest you die of hunger! I saw one who poured water into a mortar, and ground it with all his might with a pestle of iron, fancying he did a thing useful and necessary : but it remained water only, none the less."

Just there the conversation broke off, suddenly, and the disputants parted. The horses had been brought for Lucian. The boy went home, and Marius onward, to visit a friend whose abode lay further. As he returned to Rome towards evening the melancholy aspect, natural to a city of the dead, had triumphed over the superficial gaudiness of the early day. He could almost have fancied Canidia there, picking her way among the rickety lamps, to rifle some ruined or neglected tomb; for these tombs were not all equally well cared for (Post mortem nescio!) and it had been one of the pieties of Aurelius to frame a very severe law to prevent the defacing of the ancient monuments of the dead. There seemed to Marius to be some new meaning in that terror of isolation, of being left alone in these places of which the sepulchral inscriptions were so full. A blood-red sunset was dying angrily, and its wild glare upon the shadowy objects about him concurred with his own fancy, in weaving all the associations of this famous way and its deeply graven marks of immemorial travel (together with all the associations of the morning's enthusiastic conference on the true way of that other sort of traveling) around a very melancholy image, almost ghastly in the traces of its great sorrows—bearing along forever, on bleeding feet, the instrument of its punishment—which was all Marius could recall distinctly of a certain Christian legend he had heard. It was the legend, however, of an encounter upon this very spot, of two wayfarers on the Appian Way, as also upon some very dimly discerned mental journey, altogether different from himself and his late companions—an encounter between Love, literally fainting by the road, and Love “traveling in the greatness of his strength,” Love itself, suddenly appearing to sustain that other. It was a strange contrast to anything actually presented in that morning’s conversation, yet somehow seemed to recall its very words—“Do they never come down again (he seemed to hear once more that well-modulated voice), Do they never come down again from the heights, to help those whom they left here below?”—“And we too desire, not a fair one, but the fairest of all. Unless we find him, we shall think we have failed.”

CHAPTER XXV.

SUNT LACRIMÆ RERUM.

It had become a habit with Marius—one of his modernisms—developed by his assistance at those “conversations” of Aurelius with himself, to keep a register of the movements of his own private thoughts or humors; not continuously indeed, but sometimes for lengthy intervals, during which it was no idle self-indulgence, but a necessity of his intellectual life, to “confess himself,” with an intimacy, seemingly rare among the ancients; ancient writers, at all events, having been jealous, for the most part, of affording us so much as a glimpse of that interior self, which in many cases would have actually doubled the interest of their objective informations.

“If a particular tutelary or genius,” writes Marius, “according to old belief, walks beside each one of us through life, mine is certainly a capricious creature! He fills one with wayward, unaccountable, yet quite irresistible humors, and seems always to be in collusion with some outward circumstance, often trivial enough in itself—the condition of the weather, forsooth!—the people one meets by chance—the things one happens to overhear them say (veritable ἐνόδοι ὄμβρολοι, or omens by the wayside, as the old Greeks fancied), to push on the unreasonable prepossessions of the moment into weighty motives. It was doubtless a quite explicable, physical fatigue which presented me to myself, on awaking this morning so lack-luster and trite. But I must needs take my petulance, contrasting it with my accustomed morning hopefulness, as a sign of the ageing of appetite, of a decay in the very capacity of enjoyment. We need some imaginative stimulus, some not impossible ideal which may shape vague hope, and transform it into effective desire, to carry us year after year, without disgust, through the routine-work which is so large a part of life.

“Then, how if appetite, be it for real or ideal, should itself fail one after awhile? Ah, yes! it is of cold always that men die; and on some of us it creeps very gradually. In truth, I can remember just such a lack-luster condition of feeling once or twice before. But I note, that it was accompanied then by an odd indifference, as the thought of them occurred to me, in regard to the sufferings of others—a kind of callousness, so unusual with me, as at once to mark the humor it accompanied as a palpably morbid one, which would not last. Were those sufferings, great or little, I asked myself then, of more real consequence to them than mine to me, as I remind myself that ‘nothing that will end is really long’—long enough to be thought of importance? But to-day, my own sense of fatigue, the pity I conceive for myself, disposed me strongly to a tenderness for others.

For a moment the whole world seemed to present itself as a hospital of sick persons; many of them sick in mind; and all of whom it would be a brutality not to humor.

“ Why, when I went out to walk off my wayward fancies, did I confront the very sort of incident (my unfortunate genius had surely beckoned it from afar to vex me) likely to irritate it further? A party of men were coming down the street. They were leading a fine race-horse; a handsome beast, but badly hurt somewhere, in the circus, and useless. They were taking him to slaughter; and I think the animal knew it: he cast such looks, as if of mad appeal, to those who passed him, as he went to die in his beauty and pride, for just that one mischance or fault, among the strangers to whom his old owner had deserted him; although the morning air was still so animating, and pleasant to snuff. I could have fancied a soul in the creature, swelling against its luck. And I had come across the incident just when it would figure to me as the very symbol of our poor humanity, in its capacities for pain, its wretched accidents, its imperfect sympathies, which can never quite identify us with each other; the very power of utterance and appeal seeming to fail, in proportion as our sorrows come home to ourselves, are really our own. We are constructed for suffering! What proofs of it does but one day afford, if we care to note them, as we go—a whole long chaplet of sorrowful mysteries! Sunt lacrimæ rerum et mentem mortalia tangunt.

“Men’s fortunes touch us ! The little children of one of those institutions for the support of orphans, now become fashionable among us as memorials of eminent people deceased, are going, in long file, along the street, on their way to a holiday in the country. They halt, and count themselves with an air of triumph, to show that they are all there. Their gay chatter has disturbed a little group of peasants ; a young woman and her husband, who have brought the old mother, now past work and witless, to place her in a house provided for such afflicted persons. They are fairly affectionate, but anxious how the thing they have to do may go—hope only that she may permit them to leave her there quietly behind them. And the poor old soul is excited by the noise made by the children, and partly aware of what is going to happen with her. She too begins to count—one, two, three, five—on her trembling fingers, misshapen by a life of toil. ‘Yes ! yes ! and twice five make ten’—they say, to pacify her. It is her last appeal to be taken home again ; her proof that all is not yet up with her ; that she is, at all events, still as capable as those joyous children.

“At the baths, a party of laborers are at work upon one of the great brick furnaces, in a cloud of black dust. A frail young child has brought food for one of them, and sits apart, waiting till his father comes—watching the labor, but with a painful distaste for the din and dirt. He is regarding wistfully his own place in the world, prepared there before him. His mind, as he watches, is grown-up for a moment ; and he foresees, as it were, in that moment, all the long tale of days, of early awakings, of his own coming life of drudgery at work like this.

“ A man comes along carrying a boy whose rough work has already begun—the only child, whose presence beside him sweetened his toil a little. The boy has been badly injured by a fall of brick-work, yet rides boldly with an effort, on his father’s shoulders. It will be the way of natural affection to keep him alive as long as possible, though with that miserably shattered body—“ Ah ! with us still, and feeling our care beside him ! ’—and yet surely not without a heartbreaking sigh of relief, alike from him and them, when the end comes.

“ On the alert for incidents like these, yet of necessity passing them by on the other side, I find it hard to get rid of a sense that I, for one, have failed in love. I could yield to the humor till I seemed to have had my share in those great public cruelties, those shocking legal crimes, like the cold-blooded slaughter, according to law, of the four hundred slaves one by one, under Nero, because one of their number was thought to have murdered his master. All that, together with the kind of facile apologies which those who had no share in the deed may have made for it, as they went about quietly on their own affairs that day, seems to come very close to me, as I think over it. And to how many of those now actually around me, whose life is a sore one, must I be indifferent, if I ever perceive the soreness at all ? To some, perhaps, the circumstances of my own life may cause me necessarily to be opposed, regarding those interests which actually determine the happiness of theirs. I would that a stronger love might arise in my heart!

“Yet there is plenty of charity in the world. My patron, the Stoic emperor, has even made it fashionable. To celebrate one of his brief returns to Rome from the war lately, over and above a largess of gold pieces to all who would, the public debts were forgiven. He made a nice show of it: for once, the Romans entertained themselves with a good-natured spectacle, and the whole town came to see the great bonfire in the Forum, into which all bonds and evidence of debt were thrown on delivery, by the emperor himself; many private creditors following his example. That was done well enough! Only, what I feel is, that no charity at all can get at a certain natural unkindness which I find in things themselves.

“When I first came to Rome, eager to observe its religion, especially its antiquities of religious usage, I assisted at the most curious, perhaps, of them all, and the most deeply marked with that immobility which is a sort of ideal in the Roman religion. The ceremony took place at a singular spot some miles distant from the city, among the low hills on the bank of the Tiber, beyond the Aurelian Gate. There, in a little wood of venerable trees, piously allowed to have their own way, age after age—ilex and cypress remaining where they fell at last, one over the other, and all caught, in that early May-time, under a riotous tangle of wild clematis —was to be found a magnificent sanctuary, in which the members of the Arval College assembled themselves on certain days. The axe never touched those trees—Nay! it was forbidden to introduce any iron thing whatsoever within the precincts; not only because the deities of those quiet places hate to be disturbed by the noise of iron, but also in memory of that better age—the lost Golden Age—the homely age of the potters, of which the central act of the festival was a commemoration.

“The preliminary ceremonies were long and complicated, but of a character familiar enough. What was peculiar to the time and place was the solemn exposition, after lavation of hands, processions backwards and forwards, and certain changes of vestments, of the identical earthen vessels (veritable relics of the old religion of Numa) out of which the holy Numa himself had eaten and drunk. exposed above a kind of altar, amid a cloud of flowers and incense, and many lights, to the veneration of the credulous or the faithful.

“They were vases or cups of burnt clay, rude in form: and the religious veneration thus offered to them expressed the desire to give honor to a simpler age, before iron had found place in human life—the persuasion that that age was worth remembering, and a hope that it might come again.

“That a Numa, and his age of gold, would return, has been the hope or the dream of some, in every age. Yet if he did come back, or any equivalent of his presence, he could but alleviate, and by no means wholly remove, that root of evil, certainly of sorrow, of outraged human sense, in things, which one must carefully distinguish from all preventible accidents. Death, and the little perpetual daily dyings, which have something of its sting, he must necessarily leave untouched. And, methinks, that were all the rest of man's life framed entirely to his liking, he would straightway begin to sadden himself, over the fate—say, of the flowers! For there is (has come to be since Numa lived perhaps) a capacity for sorrow in his heart, which grows with all the growth, alike of the individual and of the race, in intellectual delicacy and power, and which will find its aliment.

“Of that sort of golden age, indeed, one discerns even now a trace, here and there. Often have I maintained that, in this generous southern country at least, Epicureanism is the special philosophy of the poor. How little I myself really need, when people leave me alone, with the intellectual powers at work serenely. The drops of falling water, a few wild flowers with their priceless fragrance, even a few tufts of half-dead leaves, changing color in the quiet of a room that has but light and shadow in it; these, for a susceptible mind, might well do duty for all the glory of Augustus. I notice often the true character of the fondness of the roughest working-people for their young children, a delicate appreciation, not only of their serviceable affection, but of their visible graces: and indeed, in this country, the children are almost always worth looking at. I see daily, in fine weather, a child like a delicate nosegay, run to meet the rudest of brick-makers as he comes from work. She is not at all afraid to hang upon his rough hand; and through her, he reaches out to, he makes his own, something out of that great world, so distant from him yet so real, of humanity's refinements. What is of finer soul, or of finer stuff, in things, and demands delicate touching—the delicacy of the little child represents to him that, initiates him into that. There, surely, is a touch of the secular gold, of a perpetual age of gold. But then again, think for a moment, with what a hard humor at the nature of things, his struggle for bare life will go on, if the child should happen to die. I saw to-day, under one of the archways of the baths, two children very seriously at play—a fair girl and a perfectly crippled younger brother. Two toy chairs and a little table, and sprigs of fir set upright in the sand for a garden! They were playing at housekeeping. Well! the girl thinks her life a perfectly good thing in the love of this crippled brother. But she will have a jealous lover in time; and the boy, though his face is not altogether unpleasant, is after all a hopeless cripple.

“For there is a certain grief in things as they are, in man as he has come to be, as he certainly is, over and above those griefs of circumstance which are in a measure removable—an inexplicable shortcoming, or misadventure, on the part of nature itself—death, and old age as it must needs be, and that watching of their approach, which makes every stage of life like a dying over and over again. Almost all death is painful, and in every thing that comes to an end a touch of death, and therefore of a wretched coldness struck home to one, of remorse, of loss and parting, of outraged attachments. Given faultless men and women, given a perfect state of society which should have no need to practise on men's susceptibilities for its own selfish ends, adding one turn more to the wheel of the great rack for its own interest or amusement, there would still be this evil in the world, of a certain necessary sorrow and desolation, felt, just in proportion to the moral, the nervous perfection men have reached. And what is needed in the world, over against that, is a certain general, permanent force of compassion—humanity's standing self-pity—as an elementary ingredient of our social atmosphere, if we are to live in it at all. I wonder, sometimes, how man has cajoled himself into the bearing of his burden so far, seeing how every step his labor has won for him, from age to age, in the capacity of apprehension, must needs increase his dejection; as if the increase of knowledge were but the revelation of the radical hopelessness of his position: and I would that there were one even as I, behind this vain show of things!

“At all events, the actual conditions of our life being as they are, and the capacity for suffering so large a principle in things, and the only principle, always safe, a sympathy with the pain one actually sees, it follows that the constituent practical difference between men will be their capacity for a trained insight into those conditions, their capacity for sympathy; and the future with those who have most of it. And for the present, those who have much of it, have (I tell myself) something to hold by, even in the dissolution of a world, or in that dissolution of self, which is, for every one, no less than the dissolution of the world it represents for him. Nearly all of us, I suppose, have had our moments, in which any effective sympathy for us has seemed impossible, and our pain in life a mere stupid outrage upon us, like some overwhelming physical violence; and we could seek refuge from it, at best, only in a mere general sense of goodwill, somewhere perhaps. And then, to one's surprise, the discovery of that goodwill, if it were only in a not unfriendly animal, may seem to have explained, and actually justified, the existence of our pain at all. Certainly, there have been occasions when I have felt that if others cared for me as I did for them, it would be, not so much a solace of loss, as an equivalent for it—a certain real thing in itself—a touching of that absolute ground among all the changes of phenomena, such as our philosophers of late have professed themselves quite unable to find. In the mere clinging of human creatures to each other, nay! in one's own solitary self-pity, even amidst what might seem absolute loss, I seem to touch the eternal. A certain very real new thing is evolved in that pitiful contact, which, on a review of all the perplexity of life, satisfies the moral sense, and removes that appearance of unkindness in the soul of things themselves, and assures us that not everything has been in vain.

“And I know not how, but in the thought thus suggested, I seem to take up, and re-knit myself to, a well-remembered hour, when by some gracious accident (it was on a journey), all things about me fell into a more perfect harmony than is their wont. For a moment, all things seemed to be, after all, almost for the best. Through the train of my thoughts, one against another, it was as if I felt the dominance of a person in controversy—a wrestler—with me. Just now, I seem to be at the point where I left off then. My antagonist has closed with me again. A protest comes, out of the very depth and dust of man’s radically hopeless position in the world, with the energy of one of those suffering yet prevailing deities, of which old poetry tells. Dared one hope that there is a heart, even as ours, in that divine Assistant of one’s thoughts—a heart even as mine, behind this vain show of things !”

CHAPTER XXVI.

AH ! VOILÀ LES ÂMES QU'IL FALLOIT À LA MIENNE !

Rousseau.

THE charm of its poetry, a poetry of the affections, wonderfully fresh in that threadbare world, would have led Marius, if nothing else had done so, again and again, to Cecilia's house. He found a range of intellectual pleasures, altogether new to him, in the sympathy of that pure and elevated soul. Elevation of soul, generosity, humanity—little by little it came to seem to him as if these existed nowhere else. The sentiment of maternity, above all, as he understood it there, seemed to reinforce, as with the sanction of some divine pattern of it higher still, the claims of that, and of all natural feeling everywhere, down even to the sheep bleating on the hills, nay! even to the mother-wolf, in her hungry cave. He saw its true place in the world, given at last, to the bare capacity for suffering in any creature, however feeble or seemingly useless. In this chivalry, this anxious fidelity to what could not help itself, or could hardly dare claim not to be forgotten, which seemed to leave the world's heroism a mere property of the stage, what a contrast to the hard contempt of death, of pain, of glory even, in those discourses of Aurelius !

But if Marius thought at times that some long-cherished desires were here about to blossom for him, in the sort of home he had sometimes pictured to himself, and the very charm of which would lie in its distinction from random passions ; that in this woman to whom children instinctively clung, was the sister at least, he had always longed for ; there were also circumstances which reminded him that a certain rule against second marriages, among these people was still of some force ; incidents, moreover, which warned his susceptible soul, like omens, not to mix together the flesh and the spirit, nor to make the matter of a heavenly banquet serve for earthly meat and drink.

One day he found Cecilia occupied with the burial of one of the children of her household. It was on the tiny brow of such a child, as he now heard, that the Christian new light had first come to them—in, the light of mere physical life, kindling again there, when the child was dead, or supposed to be dead. The aged servant of Christ had arrived in the midst of their noisy grief ; and mounting to the little chamber where it lay, had returned, not long afterwards, with the child stirring in his arms as he descended the stair rapidly ; bursting open the tightly-wound folds of its shroud and scattering the flowers out of them, as life kindled again through its limbs.

Old Roman common sense had taught people to occupy their thoughts as little as might be with children who died young. Here, to-day, in this curious house, all thoughts were tenderly bent on the little waxen figure; yet with a kind of exultation and joy notwithstanding the loud weeping of the mother. The other children, its late companions, broke with it, suddenly, into the place where its black bed was lying open to receive it. Pushing away the grim fossors, they ranged themselves around it in order, and chanted that old psalm of theirs—Laudate pueri dominum! Dead children, children's graves—Marius had been always half aware of an old superstitious fancy in his mind concerning them; as if in coming near them he came near the failure of some lately-born hope or purpose of his own. And now, perusing intently the expression with which Cecilia bent upon all this, and returned afterwards to the house, he felt that he too had had to-day his funeral of a little child. But it had always been his policy, through all his pursuit of "experience," to fly in time from any too disturbing passion, likely to quicken his pulses beyond the point at which the quiet work of life was practicable. Had he after all been taken unawares, so that it was no longer possible to fly! At least, during the journey he took, by way of testing the existence of any chain about him, he found a certain disappointment at his heart, greater than he could have anticipated; and as he passed over the crisp leaves, nipped off in multitudes by the first sudden cold of winter, he felt that the mental atmosphere within himself was perceptibly colder.

Yet it was, finally, a quite successful resignation which he achieved, on a review, after his manner, during that absence, of loss and gain. The image of Cecilia seemed already to have become like some matter of history or poetry, or a picture on the wall. And on his return to Rome there had been a rumor among those people of things which certainly did not speak of any merely tranquil loving, but hinted that he had come across a world, the lightest contact with which might make appropriate to him also the precept that "They which have wives be as they that have none."

That was brought home to him, when, in early spring, he ventured once more to listen to the sweet singing of the Eucharist. It breathed more than ever the spirit of a wonderful hope,—hopes more daring than poor, laboring humanity had ever seriously entertained before, though it was plain that a great terror had fallen. Even amid stifled sobbing, as the pathetic words of the psalter relieved the tension of their hearts, the people around him still wore upon their faces that habitual gleam of joy and placid satisfaction. They were still under the influence of an immense gratitude in thinking, even amid their present distress, of the hour of a great deliverance. As he followed again that mystical dialogue, he felt also again, like a mighty breath about him, the influence, the half-realized presence, of a great multitude, as if thronging along all those awful passages, to hear the sentence of its release from prison ; a company which represented nothing less than—orbis terrarum—the whole company of mankind And the special note of the day expressed that relief—a sound new to him, drawn deep from some old Hebrew source, as he conjectured, repeated over and over again, at every pause and movement of the long ceremony.

And then, in its place, by way of a sacred lection, in shocking contrast with the peaceful dignity of all around him, came the Epistle of the churches of Lyons and Vienne, to “their sister,” the church of Rome. For the “Peace” of the church had been broken—broken, as Marius could not but acknowledge, on the responsibility of the emperor Aurelius himself, following tamely, as a matter of course, the traces of his predecessors, and gratuitously enlisting, against the good as well as the evil of that great pagan world, the strange new heroism of which this singular message was full ; and the greatness of which certainly lifted away all merely private regret, inclining one, at last, actually to draw sword for the oppressed, as if in some new order of knighthood—

“The pains which our brethren have borne we are not able fully to tell, for the foe fell upon us with his whole strength. But the grace of God fought for us, set free the weak, and made ready those who, like pillars, were able to bear the weight. These, coming now into close strife with the foe, bore every kind of pang and shame. At the time of the fair which is held here with a vast crowd, the governor led forth the Martyrs as a show. Holding what was thought great but little, and that the pains of to-day are not deserving to be measured against the glory that shall be made known, these worthy wrestlers went on joyful ; their delight and the sweet favor of God mingling in their faces, so that their bonds seemed but a goodly array, and like the golden bracelets of a bride. Filled with the fragrance of Christ, they seemed to some to have been touched with earthly perfumes.

“ Vettius Epagathus, though he was very young, because he could not bear to see unjust judgment given against us, vented his anger, and sought to be heard for the brethren, for he was a youth of high place. Whereupon the governor asked him whether he also were a Christian. He confessed in a clear voice, and was added to the Martyrs. But he had the Paraclete within him ; as, in truth, he showed by the fulness of his love ; glorying in the defense of his brethren, and to give his life for theirs.

“ Then was fulfilled the saying of the Lord that the day would come, when every one that slayeth you will think that he doeth God service. Most madly did the mob, the governor and the soldiers rage against the handmaiden Blandina, in whom Christ showed that what seems mean among men is of price with Him. For whilst we all, and her earthly mistress, who was herself one of the contending Martyrs, were fearful lest through the weak flesh she should be unable to profess her faith, Blandina was filled with such power that her tormentors, following upon each other from morning till night, owned that they were overcome, and had no more that they could do to her . admiring that she still breathed after her whole body was torn asunder.

“But this blessed one, in the midst of her witness itself, renewed her strength ; and to repeat, I am Christ's ! was to her rest, refreshment, and relief from pain. As to Alexander, he neither uttered a groan nor any sound at all, but in his heart talked with God. Sanctus, the deacon, also, bearing beyond all measure the many pains devised by them, hoping that they would get something from him, did not even tell his name ; but to all questions answered only, I am Christ's ! For, this he confessed instead of his name, his race, and everything beside. Whence also a strife in torturing him arose between the governor and those tormentors, so that when they had nothing else they could do they set red-hot plates of brass to the most tender parts of his body. But he stood firm in his profession, strengthened and cooled by that stream of living water which flows from Christ. His corpse, a single wound, and that had wholly lost the form of man, was the measure of his pain. But Christ, paining in him, set forth a copy to the rest—that there is nothing fearful, nothing painful, where the love of the Father overcomes. And as all those cruelties were made null through the patience of the Witnesses, they bethought them of other things ; among which was their imprisonment in a dark and most sorrowful place, where many were privily strangled. But though void of man's aid, they were filled with power from the Lord, both in body and mind, and strengthened the rest. Also, much joy was in our virgin Mother, the church ; for, by means of these, those who had fallen away retraced their steps—were again conceived, were filled again with lively heat, and hastened to make the confession of their faith.

“ The holy bishop Pothinus, who was now past ninety years old and weak in body, yet in his heat of soul and his longing for martyrdom, roused what strength he had, and was also cruelly dragged to judgment, and gave witness. Thereupon he suffered many stripes, all thinking it would be a wickedness if they fell short in ill-use of him, for that thus they would avenge their own gods. Hardly drawing breath, he was thrown into prison, and after two days there died.

“ After these things their martyrdom was parted into divers manners. Plaiting as it were one crown of many colors and all kinds of flowers, they yielded it to God. Maturus, therefore, Sanctus and Blandina, were led to the wild beasts. And Maturus and Sanctus passed through all the pains of the amphitheater, as if they had suffered nothing before : or rather, as having in many trials overcome, and now contending for the prize itself, were at last dismissed.

“ But Blandina was bound and hung upon a stake, and set forth as food for the assault of the wild beasts. And as she thus seemed to be hanging upon the Cross, by her fiery prayers she imparted much alacrity to those contending Witnesses. For as they looked upon her with the eye of flesh, through her, they saw Him that was crucified. But as none of the beasts would then touch her, she was taken down from the Cross, and sent back to prison for another day : that, though weak and mean, yet clothed with the mighty Wrestler, Christ Jesus, she might by many conquests give heart to her brethren.

“On the last day, therefore, of the shows, she was brought forth again, together with Ponticus, a lad of about fifteen years old. They were brought in every day to behold the pains of the rest. And when they wavered not, the mob was full of rage; pitying neither the youth of the lad, nor the sex of the maiden. Hence, they drave them through the whole round of pain. And Ponticus, taking heart from Blandina, having borne well the whole of those torments, gave up his life. Last of all, the blessed Blandina herself, as a mother that had given life to her children, and sent them like conquerors to the great King, hastened, with joy at the end, to them, as to a marriage-feast; even the foe owning that no woman had ever borne pain, so manifold and great as hers.

“Not even then was their anger appeased; some among them seeking for us pains, if it might be, yet greater; that the saying might be fulfilled, He that is unjust, let him be unjust still. And their rage against the Witnesses took a new form, so that we were in much sorrow for lack of freedom to entrust their bodies to the earth. Neither did the night-time, nor the offer of money, avail us for this matter; but they guarded them by every means, as if it were a great gain to hinder their burial. Therefore, after they had been displayed to view for many days, they were at length burned to ashes, and cast into the river Rhone, which flows by this place, that there might be not a vestige of them left upon the earth. For they said, Now shall we see whether they will rise again, and whether their God can save them out of our hands."

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE TRIUMPH OF MARCUS AURELIUS.

It was not many months after the date of that epistle that Marius, then expecting to leave Rome for a long time, and in fact about to leave it forever, stood to witness the triumphal entry of Marcus Aurelius, almost at the exact spot from which he had watched the emperor's solemn return to the capital on his own first coming thither. It was a full triumph this time—Justus Triumphus—justified, by far more than the due amount of bloodshed in those Northern wars, now it might seem happily at an end. Among the captives, amid the laughter of the crowds at his blowsy upper garment, his trousered legs and conical wolf-skin cap, walked our own ancestor, representative of subject Germany, under a figure very familiar in later Roman sculpture; and, though certainly with none of the grace of the Dying Gaul, yet with plenty of uncouth pathos in his misshapen features and pale, servile, yet angry eyes. His children, white-skinned and golden-haired “as angels,” trudged beside him. His brothers, of the animal world, the ibex, the wild-cat, and the reindeer stalking and trumpeting grandly, found their due place in the procession; and among the spoil, set forth on a portable frame that it might be distinctly seen (not a mere model, but the very house he had lived in) a wattled cottage in all the simplicity of its snug contrivances against the cold, and well-calculated to give a moment's delight to his new, sophisticated masters.

Andrea Mantegna, working at the end of the fifteenth century, for a society full of antiquarian fervor at the sight of the earthy relics of the old Roman people, day by day returning to light out of the clay—childish still, moreover, and with no more suspicion of pasteboard than the old Romans themselves, in its unabashed love of open-air pageantries, has invested this, the greatest, and alas! the most characteristic, of the splendors of imperial Rome, with a reality livelier than any description. The homely sentiments for which he has found place in his learned paintings are hardly more lifelike than the great public incidents of the show, there depicted. And then, with all that vivid realism, how refined, how dignified, how select in type, is this reflection of the old Roman world! especially, in its time-mellowed red and gold, for the modern visitor to the old English palace.

It was under no such selected type that the great procession presented itself to Marius; though, in effect, he found something there, as it were prophetic, and evocative of ghosts: as susceptible minds will do, in a repetition such as this, after a long interval, of some notable incident, which may yet perhaps have no direct concern for themselves. In truth, he had been so bent of late on certain very personal interests that the broad current of the world's doings seemed to have withdrawn into the distance, but now, in this procession, to return once more into evidence for him. That, at least, had been holding on its old way, and was all its old self, thus passing by dramatically, and accentuating, in this favorite spectacle, its mode of viewing things. And even without the contrast of a very different scene from that he would have found it, just now, a somewhat vulgar spectacle. The temples, wide open, with their ropes of roses flapping in the wind against the rich, reflecting marble, their startling draperies and heavy cloud of incense, were but the centers of a great banquet spread through all the gaudily colored streets of Rome, for which the carnivorous appetite of those who thronged them in the glare of the mid-day sun was frankly enough asserted. At best, they were but calling their gods to share with them the cooked, sacrificial, and other meats, reeking to the sky. The child, who was concerned for the sorrows of one of those Northern captives as he passed by, and explained to his comrade—"There's feeling in that hand, you know!" benumbed and lifeless as it looked in the chain, seemed, in a moment, to turn the whole show into its own proper tinsel. Yes! these Romans were a coarse, a vulgar people; and their vulgarity in full evidence here. And Aurelius himself seemed to have undergone the world's coinage, and fallen to the level of his reward, in a mediocrity no longer golden.

Yet if, as he passed by (almost filling the quaint old circular chariot with his magnificent attire, flowered with gold) he presented himself to Marius, chiefly as one who had made the great mistake; to the multitude he came as a more than magnanimous conqueror. That he had "forgiven" the innocent wife and children of the dashing and almost successful rebel Avidius Cassius, now no more, was a recent circumstance still in memory. As the children went past, not among those who would presently be detached from the great progress for execution, ere the emperor on his knees ascended the steps of the Capitol, but happy and radiant, as adopted members of the imperial family, the crowd actually enjoyed a moral exhibition, which might become the fashion. And it was in concession to some possible touch of a heroism, that had really cost him something, in all this, that Marius resolved to seek the emperor once more, with an appeal for common sense, for reason and justice.

He had set out at last to revisit his old home; and knowing that Aurelius was then in retreat at the villa of Lorium, which lay almost on his way thither, determined there to present himself. Although the great plain was steadily dying, a new race of wild birds establishing itself there, as he knew enough of their habits to understand, and the idle contadino with his never-ending ditty always of decay and death, replacing the lusty Roman laborer, never had this poetic country between Rome and the sea impressed him more than on the sunless day of early autumn, under which all that fell within the immense horizon was presented in one uniform tone of a clear, penitential blue. Stimulating to the fancy as was that range of low hills to the northwards, already troubled with the upbreking of the Apennines, yet the want of quiet in their outline, with a multitude of wild jaggs and sudden upheavals, marked them as but the ruins of nature; while at all the little ascents and descents of the road might be noted traces of the abandoned work of man. At intervals, the way was still redolent of the floral relics of summer, daphne and myrtle blossom, in the little, sheltered hollows and ravines. At last amid rocks here and there piercing the soil, as those descents became steeper, and the main line of the Apennines, now visible, gave a higher accent to the scene, he espied over the plateau, almost like one of those broken hills, cutting the horizon towards the sea, the old brown villa itself—favorite retreat of one after another of the family of the Antonines. As he approached it, reminiscences crowded upon him, above all of that old life there of Antoninus Pius, in its mansuetude and calm. It was here that his last moment had come, just as the tribune of the watch had received from his lips the word Æquanimitas! as the watchword of the night. To see their emperor living there like one of his simplest subjects, his hands red at vintage-time with the juice of the grapes, hunting, teaching his children, starting betimes for long days, with all who cared to join, in antiquarian researches in the country around—all this had seemed to mean the peace of mankind.

Upon that had come (like a stain, it seemed to him just then) the more intimate life of Faustina. Surely, that marvelous but malign beauty must still haunt those rooms, like an unquiet, dead goddess, who might have perhaps, after all, something reassuring to tell surviving mortals about her ambiguous self. When the news had come to Rome, two years before, that those eyes, always so persistently turned to vanity, had suddenly closed forever, a strong desire to pray had come over Marius, as he followed in fancy on its wild way the soul of one he had spoken with now and again, and whose presence in it for a time the world of art could so ill have spared. Certainly the honors freely accorded to embalm her memory were poetic enough—the rich temple left among those wild villagers at the spot, now it was hoped sacred forever, where she had breathed her last; the golden image, in her old place at the amphitheater; the altar at which the newly married might make their sacrifice; above all, the great foundation for orphan girls, to be called after her name.

It was precisely on account of that, that Marius failed to see Aurelius again, and make the chivalrous effort at enlightenment he had proposed to himself. Entering the villa, he learned from an usher, at the closed door of the long gallery (famous in the memory of many a visitor, for its prospects) which led to the imperial apartments, that the emperor was already in audience: Marius must await his turn—he knew not how long it might be. An odd audience it seemed ; for at that moment, through the closed door came shouts of laughter, the laughter of a great crowd of children (the “Faustinian Children” themselves, as he afterwards learned) happy and at their ease, in the imperial presence. It was the vagueness of the time for which so pleasant a reception might last, so pleasant that he would hardly have wished to shorten it, which made Marius finally determine to proceed, it being necessary that he should accomplish the first stage of his journey on that day. The thing was not to be—Vale ! anima infelicissima !—and he might at least carry away that sound of the laughing orphan children, as a not unamiable last impression of kings and their houses.

The place he was now about to visit, as the resting-place of his dead especially, had never been forgotten. Only, the first eager period of his life in Rome had slipped on rapidly ; and, almost on a sudden, that old time had come to seem very long ago. An almost burdensome solemnity had grown about his memory of the place, so that to revisit it seemed a thing that needed preparation : it was what he could not have done hastily. He half feared to lessen, or disturb, its value for himself. And now as he traveled leisurely towards it, and so far with quite tranquil mind, interested also in many another place by the way, he discovered a shorter road to the end of his journey, and found himself indeed approaching the spot that was to him like no other. Dreaming now only of the dead before him, he journeyed on rapidly through the night ; the thought of the thing increasing on him, in the darkness. It was as if they had been waiting for him there all those years, and felt his footsteps approaching now, and understood his devotion, quite gratefully, in spite of its tardiness, in that lowliness of theirs. As morning came, his late tranquillity of mind had given way to a grief which surprised him by its freshness. He was moved more than he could have thought possible by so distant a sorrow. “ To-day ! ”—they seemed to be saying, as the hard dawn broke,—“ To-day, he will come ! ” At last, amid all his distractions, they had become the main purpose of what he was then doing. The world around it, when he actually reached the place later in the day, was in a mood very different—so work-a-day, it seemed, on that fine afternoon, and the villages he passed through so silent ; the inhabitants being for the most part, at their labor in the country. At last, above the tiled outbuildings, there were the walls of the old villa itself, with its tower for the pigeons ; and among, not cypresses, but poplar-trees with leaves like golden fruit, the birds floating around it, the conical roof of the burial-place itself. In the presence of an old servant who remembered him, the great seals were broken, the rusty key turned at last in the lock, the door was forced out among the weeds grown thickly about it, and Marius was actually in the place which had been so often in his thoughts.

He was shocked, with a touch of remorse however, only by an odd air of neglect, the neglect of a place merely allowed to remain as when it was last used, and left in a hurry, till long years had covered all alike with thick dust—the faded flowers, the burnt-out lamps, the tools and hardened mortar of the workmen who had had something to do there. A heavy fragment of woodwork had fallen and chipped open one of the oldest of the mortuary urns, many hundreds in number, ranged around the walls. It was not properly an urn, but a minute coffin of stone, and the fracture had revealed a piteous spectacle of the moldering, unburned remains within ; the bones of a child, as he understood, which might have died, in a ripe age, three times over, since it slipped away from among his great-grandfathers, so far up in the line. Yet the protruding baby hand seemed to stir up in him feelings vivid enough, bringing him intimately within the scope of dead people's grievances. He noticed, side by side with the urn of his mother, that of a boy of about his own age—one of the serving-boys of the household—who had descended hither, from the light of childhood, almost at the same time with her. It seemed as if this boy of his own age had taken filial place beside her there, in his stead. That hard feeling again, which had always lingered in his mind with the thought of the father he had scarcely known, melted wholly away, as he read the precise number of his years, and reflected suddenly—He was of my own present age ; no hard old man, but with interests, as he looked round him on the world for the last time, even as mine to-day !

And with that came a blinding rush of kindness, as if two alienated friends had come to understand each other at last. There was weakness in all this; as there is in all care for dead persons, to which, however, people will always yield in proportion as they really care for each other. After all, with a vain yearning to be able to do something for them still, he reflected, as he stood there, that such doing must be, in the nature of things, mainly for himself. His own epitaph might be that old one—ἔσχατος τοῦ ἰδίου γένους—He was the last of his race! Of those who might come hither after himself probably no one would ever again come quite as he had done to-day: and it was under the influence of this thought that he determined to bury all that, deep below the surface, to be remembered only by himself, and in a way which would claim no sentiment from the indifferent. That took many days—was like a renewal of lengthy old burial rites—as he himself watched the work, early and late; coming on the last day very early, and anticipating, by stealth, the last touches, while the workmen were absent: one young lad only, finally smoothing down the earthy bed, greatly surprised at the seriousness with which Marius flung in his flowers, one by one, to mingle with the dark mold.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

ANIMA NATURALITER CHRISTIANA.

THOSE eight days at his old home, so mournfully occupied, had been for Marius in some sort a forcible disruption from the world and the roots of his life in it. He had been carried out of himself as never before; and when the time was over, it was as if the claim over him of the earth below had been vindicated, over against the interests of that living world around him. Dead, yet sentient and caressing hands seemed to reach out of the ground and to be clinging about him. Looking back sometimes now, from about the midway of life—the age, as he conceived, at which one begins to re-descend one's life—and antedating it a little, in his sad humor, he would note, almost with surprise, the unbroken placidity of the contemplation in which it had been passed. His own temper, his early theoretic scheme of things, would have pushed him on to movement and adventure. Actually, as circumstances had determined, all its movement had been inward; movement of observation only, or even of pure meditation; partly, perhaps, because throughout it had been something of a meditatio mortis, ever facing towards the act of final detachment. But death, of course, as he reflected, must be for every one nothing less than that fifth or last act of a drama, and, as such, was likely to have something of the stirring character of a dénouement. And, in fact, it was in form tragic enough that his end not long afterwards came to him.

In the midst of the extreme weariness and depression which had followed those last days, Cornelius, then, as it happened, on a journey and traveling near the place, finding traces of him, had become his guest at White-nights. It was just then that Marius felt, as he had never done before, the value to himself, the overpowering charm, of his friendship. "More than brother!"—he felt—"like a son also!" contrasting the fatigue of soul which made himself practically an older man, with the other's irrepressible youth. For it was still the wonderful hopefulness of Cornelius, his seeming prerogative over the future, which determined, and kept alive, all other sentiment concerning him. A new hope had sprung up in the world of which he, Cornelius, was a depository, which he must bear onward in it. Identifying himself with Cornelius in so dear a friendship, through him, Marius seemed to touch, to ally himself to, actually to possess for himself, the coming world; even as happy parents reach out, and take possession of it, in and through the survival of their children. For in these days their intimacy had grown very close, as they moved hither and thither, leisurely, among the country-places thereabout, Cornelius being on his way back to Rome, till they came one evening to a little town (Marius remembered having been there on his first journey) which had even then its church and legend—the legend and holy relics of the martyr Hyacinthus, a young Roman soldier, whose blood had stained the soil of this place in the days of the emperor Trajan.

The thought of that so recent death, haunted Marius through the night, as if with audible sighs and crying above the restless wind, which came and went around their lodging. But towards dawn he slept heavily; and awaking in broad daylight, and finding Cornelius absent, set forth to seek him. The plague was still in the place—had indeed just broken out afresh; with an outbreak also of cruel superstition among its wild and miserable inhabitants. Surely, the old gods were wroth at the presence of this new enemy among them! And it was no ordinary morning into which Marius stepped forth. There was a menace in the dark masses of hill, and motionless wood, against the gray, although seemingly unclouded sky. Under this sunless heaven the earth itself seemed to fret and fume with a heat of its own, in spite of the strong night-wind. And now the wind itself had fallen. Marius seemed to be breathing some strange heavy fluid, denser than any common air. He could have fancied that the world had sunken in the night, far below its proper level, into some close, thick abysm of its atmosphere. The Christian people of the town, hardly less terrified and overwrought by the haunting sickness about them than their pagan neighbors, were at prayer before the tomb of the martyr; and even as Marius pressed among them to a place beside Cornelius, on a sudden the hills seemed to roll like a sea in motion, around the whole compass of the horizon. For a moment Marius supposed himself attacked with some sudden sickness of brain, till the fall of a great mass of building convinced him that not himself but the earth under his feet was giddy. A few moments later the little market-place was alive with the rush of the distracted inhabitants from their tottering houses; and as they waited anxiously for the second shock of earthquake, a long-smoldering suspicion leapt precipitately into well-defined purpose, and the whole mass of people was carried forward towards the band of worshipers below. An hour later, in the wild tumult which followed, the earth had been stained afresh with the blood of the martyrs Felix and Faustinus—Flores apparuerunt in terra nostra!—and their brethren, together with Cornelius and Marius, thus, as it had happened, taken among them, were prisoners, reserved for the action of the law. Marius and his friend, with certain others, exercising the privilege of their rank, made claim to be tried in Rome, or at least in the chief town of the district; where, indeed, in the troublous days that had now begun, a legal process had been already instituted. Under the care of a military guard the captives were removed, the same day, one stage of their journey; sleeping, for security, during the night, side by side with their keepers, in the rooms of a deserted shepherds' house by the wayside.

It was surmised that one of the prisoners was not a Christian : their guards were forward to make the utmost pecuniary profit of the circumstance, and during the night, Marius, taking advantage of the loose charge kept over them, and partly by a large bribe, had contrived that Cornelius, as the really innocent person, should be dismissed in safety on his way, to procure for him, as Marius explained, the proper means of defense, when the time of trials came.

And in the morning Cornelius in fact set forth alone, from their miserable place of detention. Marius believed that Cornelius was to be the husband of Cecilia; and that, perhaps strangely, had but added to the desire to get him away safely.—We wait for the great crisis which is to try what is in us : we can hardly bear the pressure of our hearts, as we think of it : the lonely wrestler, or victim, which imagination foreshadows to us, can hardly be oneself : it seems an outrage of our destiny that we should be led along so gently and imperceptibly, to so terrible a leaping-place in the dark, for more perhaps than life or death. At last, the great act, the critical moment, comes, easily, almost unconsciously. Another motion of the clock, and our fatal line—the “great climacteric point”—has been passed, which changes ourselves or our lives. In one quarter of an hour, under a sudden, uncontrollable impulse, hardly weighing what he did, almost as a matter of course and as lightly as one hires a bed for one's night's rest on a journey, Marius had taken upon himself all the heavy risk of the position in which Cornelius had then been—the long and wearisome delays of judgment, which were possible; the danger and wretchedness of a long journey in this manner; possibly the danger of death. He had delivered his brother, after the manner he had sometimes vaguely anticipated as a kind of distinction in his destiny; though indeed always with wistful calculation as to what it might cost him: and in the first moment after the thing was actually done, he felt only satisfaction at his courage, at the discovery of his possession of “nerve.”

Yet he was, as we know, no hero, no heroic martyr—had indeed no right to be; and when he had seen Cornelius depart, and, as he believed, on his blithe and hopeful way, to become the husband of Cecilia; actually, as it had happened, without a word of farewell, supposing Marius was almost immediately afterwards to follow (Marius indeed having avoided the moment of leave-taking with its possible call for an explanation of the circumstances) the reaction came. He could only guess, of course, at what might really happen. So far, he had but taken upon himself, in the stead of Cornelius, a great personal risk. It was danger, not even probable death, that he faced. Still, for one like himself especially, with all those sensibilities of which his whole manner of life had been but an education, the situation of one under trial on a criminal charge was actually full of distress. To him, in truth, a death such as the recent death of those saintly brothers, seemed no glorious end. In his case, at least, the Martyrdom, as it was called—the overpowering act of testimony that Heaven had come down among men—would be but a common execution: from the drops of his blood there would spring no miraculous, poetic flowers; no eternal aroma would indicate the place of his burial; no plenary grace, overflowing forever upon those who might stand around it. Had there been one to listen just then, there would have come, from the very depth of his desolation, an eloquent utterance at last, on the irony of men's fates, on the singular accidents of life and death.

The guards, now safely in possession of whatever money and other valuables the prisoners had had on them, pressed them forward, over the rough mountain paths, altogether careless of their sufferings. The great autumn rains were falling. At night the soldiers lighted a fire; but it was impossible to keep warm. From time to time they stopped to roast portions of the meat they carried with them, making their captives sit round the fire, and pressing it upon them. But weariness and depression of spirits had deprived Marius of appetite, even if the food had been more attractive, and for some days he partook of nothing but bad bread and water. All through the dark mornings they dragged over boggy plains, and up and down hills, wet through sometimes with the heavy rain. Even in those deplorable circumstances, he could but notice the wild, dark beauty of those places—the stormy sunrise, and placid spaces of evening. One of the keepers, a very young soldier, won him at times, by his simple kindness, to talk a little, with wonder at the lad's half-conscious, poetic delight in the adventures of the journey. At times, the whole company would lie down for rest at the roadside, hardly sheltered from the storm ; and in the deep fatigue of his spirit, his old longing for inopportune sleep overpowered him.—Sleep anywhere, and under any conditions, seemed at those times a thing one might well offer the remnants of one's life for.

It must have been about the fifth night, as he afterwards conjectured, that the soldiers, believing him likely to die, had finally left him unable to proceed further, under the care of some country people, who to the extent of their power certainly treated him kindly in his sickness. He awoke to consciousness after a severe attack of fever, lying alone on a rough bed, in a kind of hut. It seemed a remote, mysterious place, as he looked around in the silence ; but so fresh (lying, in fact, in a high pasture-land among the mountains) that he felt he should recover, if only he might just lie there in quiet long enough. Even during those nights of delirium he had felt the scent of the new-mown hay pleasantly, with a dim sense for a moment that he was lying safe in his old home. The sunlight lay clear beyond the open door ; the sounds of the cattle reached him softly from the green places around. Recalling confusedly the torturing hurry of his late journeys, he dreaded, as his consciousness of the whole situation returned, the coming of the guards. But the place remained in absolute stillness. He was, in fact, at liberty, but for his own disabled condition. And it was certainly a genuine clinging to life that he felt just then, at the very bottom of his mind. It had been so, obscurely, even through all the wild fancies of his delirium, from the moment which followed his decision for Cornelius, against himself.

The occupants of the place were to be heard presently, coming and going on their business, about him: and it was as if the approach of death brought out in all their force the merely human sentiments. There is that in death which certainly makes indifferent persons anxious to forget the dead—to put them away out of their thoughts altogether, as soon as possible. Conversely, in the deep isolation of spirit which was now creeping upon Marius, the faces of these people, casually visible, took a hold on his affections; the link of general brotherhood, the feeling of human kinship, asserting itself most strongly when it was about to be severed forever. At nights he would find this face or that impressed deeply on his fancy; and his mind would, in a troubled sort of manner, follow them onwards, on the ways of their simple, humdrum, everyday life, with a strange yearning to share it with them, envying the calm, earthy cheerfulness of all their days to-be, still under the sun (but how indifferent, of course, to him!) as if these rude people had been suddenly lifted into some height of earthly good-fortune, which must needs isolate them from himself.

Tristem neminem fecit—he repeated to himself ; his old prayer shaping itself now almost as an epitaph. Yes ! so much the very hardest judge must concede to him. And the sense of satisfaction which that left with him disposed him to a conscious effort of recollection, while he lay there, unable now even to raise his head, as he discovered on attempting to reach a pitcher of water which stood near. Revelation, vision, the uncovering of a vision, the seeing of a perfect humanity, in a perfect world—through all his alternations of mind, by some dominant instinct, determined by the original necessities of his own nature and character, he had always set that above the having or even the doing, of anything. For, such vision, if received with due attitude on his part was, in reality, the being something, such as was surely a pleasant sacrifice to whatever gods there might be, observant of him. And how goodly had the vision been !—one long unfolding of beauty and energy in things, upon the closing of which he might gratefully utter his “Vixi !” Even then, just ere his eyes were to be shut forever, the things they had seen seemed a veritable possession in hand ; the persons, the places, above all, the touching image of Jesus, apprehended dimly through the expressive faces, the crying of the children, in that mysterious drama, with a sudden sense of peace and satisfaction now, which he could not explain to himself. Surely, he had prospered in life ! And again, as of old, the sense of gratitude seemed to bring with it the sense also of a living person at his side.

For still in a shadowy world, his deeper wisdom had ever been, with a sense of economy, with a jealous estimate of gain and loss, to use life, not as the means to some problematic end, but, as far as might be, from dying hour to dying hour, an end in itself—a kind of music, all-sufficing to the duly trained ear, even as it died out on the air. Yet now, aware still in that suffering body of such vivid powers of mind and sense, as he anticipated from time to time how his sickness, practically without aid as he was in this rude place, was likely to end, and that the moment of taking final account was drawing very near, a consciousness of waste would come, with half-angry tears of self-pity, in his great weakness—a blind, outraged, angry feeling of wasted power, such as he would have himself experienced standing by the deathbed of another, in condition similar to his own.

And yet it was the fact, again, that the vision of men and things, actually revealed to him on his way through the world, had developed, with a wonderful largeness, the faculties to which it addressed itself, his whole general capacity of vision : and in that too was a success, in the view of certain, very definite, well-considered, undeniable possibilities. Throughout that elaborate and lifelong education of his receptive powers, he had ever maintained the purpose of a self-preparation towards possible further revelation, some day—an ampler vision, which should take up into itself and explain this world's delightful shows, as the scattered fragments of a poetry, till then but half-understood, might be taken up into the text of a lost epic, recovered at last. At this moment, his unclouded receptivity of soul, grown so steadily through all those years, from experience to experience, was at its height ; the house was ready for the possible guest, the tablet of the mind white and smooth, for whatsoever divine fingers might choose to write there. And was not this precisely the condition, the attitude of mind, to which something higher than he, yet akin to him, would be likely to reveal itself ; to which that influence he had felt now and again like a friendly hand upon his shoulder, amid the actual obscurities of the world, would be likely to make a further explanation ? Surely, the aim of a true philosophy must lie, not in futile efforts towards the complete accommodation of man to the circumstances in which he chances to find himself, but in the maintenance of a kind of ingenuous discontent, in the face of the very highest achievement ; the unclouded and receptive soul quitting the world finally, with the same fresh wonder with which it had entered it still unimpaired, and going on its blind way at last with the consciousness of some profound enigma in things, as its pledge of something further to come. Marius seemed to understand how one might look back upon life here, and its excellent visions, as but the portion of a race-course left behind him by a still swift runner : for a moment, he felt a curiosity and ardor, with dim trouble as of imminent vision, to enter upon a future, the possibilities of which seemed so large.

And just then, again amid the memory of certain touching actual words and images, came the thought of the great hope, that hope against hope, which, as he conceived, had arisen—Lux sedentibus in tenebris—upon the aged world; the hope which Cornelius had seemed to bear away upon him in his strength, with a buoyancy which had made Marius feel somehow, less that, by a caprice of destiny, he had been left to die in his place, than that Cornelius had gone on a mission to deliver him also from death. There had been a permanent protest established in the world, a plea, a perpetual afterthought, which humanity would henceforth ever possess in reserve, against a wholly mechanical and disheartening theory of itself and its conditions. It was a thought which relieved for him the iron outline of the horizon about him, touching it as if with soft light from beyond; filling the shadowy, hollow places to which he was on his way with the warmth of definite affections; and confirming also certain considerations by which he seemed to link himself to the generations to come in the world he was leaving. Yes! through the survival of their children, happy parents are able to think calmly, and with a very practical affection, of a world in which they are to have no direct share; planting, with a cheerful good-humor, the acorns they carry about with them, that their grandchildren may be shaded from the sun by the broad oak-trees of the future. That is nature's way of easing death to us. It was thus too, surprised, delighted, that Marius, under the power of that new hope among men, could think of the generations to come after him. Without it, dim in truth as it was, he could hardly have dared to ponder the world which limited all he really knew, as it would be when he should have departed from it. A strange tonesomeness, like a physical darkness, seemed to settle over the thought of it; as if its business hereafter must be, as far as he was concerned, carried on in some inhabited, but distant and alien, star. But with the sense of that hope warm upon him, he seemed to anticipate a care for himself, never to fail even on earth, with a reverential care for his very body—the dear sister and companion of his soul, outworn, suffering, and in the very article of death, as it was now.

For the weariness came back tenfold; and he had finally to abstain from thoughts like those, as from what caused physical pain. And then, as before in the wretched, sleepless nights of those forced marches, he would try to fix his mind, as it were impassively, and like a child thinking over the toys it loves, one after another, that it may fall asleep so, and forget all about them, the sooner, on all the persons he had loved in life—on his love for them, dead or living, grateful for his love or not, rather than on theirs for him—letting their images pass away again, or rest with him, as they would. In the bare sense of having loved he seemed to find, even amid this foundering of the ship, that on which his soul might “assuredly rest and depend.” One after another, he suffered those faces and voices to come and go, as in some mechanical exercise, as he might have repeated all the verses he knew by heart, or like the telling of beads one by one, with many a sleepy nod between-whiles.

For there remained also, for the old earthy creature still within him, that great blessedness of physical slumber. To sleep, to lose oneself in sleep—that, as he had recognized always, was a good thing. And it was after a space of deep sleep that he awoke amid the murmuring voices of the people who had kept and tended him so carefully through his sickness, now kneeling around his bed: and what he heard confirmed, in his, then perfect, clearness of soul, the spontaneous suggestion of his own bodily feeling. He had often dreamt that he had been condemned to die, that the hour, with wild thoughts of escape, had arrived; and waking, with the sun all around him, in complete liberty of life, had been full of gratitude, for his place there, alive still, in the land of the living. He read surely, now, in the manner, the doings, of these people, some of whom were passing away through the doorway, where the sun still lay heavy and full, that his last morning was come, and turned to think again of the beloved. Of old, he had often fancied that not to die on a dark and rainy day would itself have a little alleviating grace or favor about it. The people around his bed were praying fervently—Abi! Abi! anima Christiana! In the moments of his extreme helplessness their mystic bread had been placed, had descended like a snowflake from the sky, between his lips. Soothing fingers had applied to hands and feet, to all those old passage-ways of the senses, through which the world had come and gone from him, now so dim and obstructed, a medicinale oil. It was the same people, who, in the gray, austere evening of that day, took up his remains, and buried them secretly, with their accustomed prayers; but with joy also, holding his death, according to their generous view in this matter, to have been of the nature of a martyrdom; and martyrdom, as the church had always said, a kind of sacrament with plenary grace.

THE END.

2/4/35

POPULAR LITERATURE FOR THE MASSES, COMPRISING CHOICE SELECTIONS FROM THE TREASURES OF THE WORLD'S KNOWLEDGE, ISSUED IN A SUBSTANTIAL AND ATTRACTIVE CLOTH BINDING, AT A POPULAR PRICE

BURT'S HOME LIBRARY is a series which includes the standard works of the world's best literature, bound in uniform cloth binding, gilt tops, embracing chiefly selections from writers of the most notable English, American and Foreign Fiction, together with many important works in the domains of History, Biography, Philosophy, Travel, Poetry and the Essays.

A glance at the following annexed list of titles and authors will endorse the claim that the publishers make for it—that it is the most comprehensive, choice, interesting, and by far the most carefully selected series of standard authors for world-wide reading that has been produced by any publishing house in any country, and that at prices so cheap, and in a style so substantial and pleasing, as to win for it millions of readers and the approval and commendation, not only of the book trade throughout the American continent, but of hundreds of thousands of librarians, clergymen, educators and men of letters interested in the dissemination of instructive, entertaining and thoroughly wholesome reading matter for the masses.

[SEE FOLLOWING PAGES]

- Abbe Constantin. By Halevy.
 Abbot, The. By Sir Walter Scott.
 Adam Bede. By George Eliot.
 Addison's Essays. By Joseph Addison.
 Æneid of Virgil.
 Æsop's Fables.
 Alexander, the Great, Life of. By John Williams.
 Alfred, the Great, Life of. By Thomas Hughes.
 Alhambra, The. Washington Irving.
 Alice in Wonderland. Lewis Carroll.
 All Sorts and Conditions of Men. By Walter Besant.
 Alton Locke. By Charles Kingsley.
 Amiel's Journal.
 Andersen's Fairy Tales.
 Anne of Geirstein. Sir Walter Scott.
 Antiquary, The. Sir Walter Scott.
 Arabian Nights' Entertainments.
 Ardath. By Marie Corelli.
 Arnold, Benedict, Life of. By George Canning Hill.
 Arnold's Poems. Matthew Arnold.
 Around the World in the Yacht Sunbeam. By Mrs. Brassey.
 Arundel Motto. Mary Cecil Hay.
 At the Back of the North Wind. By George Macdonald.
 Attic Philosopher. Emile Souvestre.
 Autocrat of the Breakfast Table. By O. W. Holmes.
 Bacon's Essays. By Francis Bacon.
 Barnaby Rudge. By Charles Dickens.
 Barrack Room Ballads. By Rudyard Kipling.
 Beulah. By Augusta J. Evans.
 Black Beauty. By Anna Sewell.
 Black Dwarf, The. Sir Walter Scott.
 Black Rock. By Ralph Connor.
 Black Tulip, The. By Alex. Dumas.
 Bleak House. By Charles Dickens.
 Blithedale Romance, The. By Nathaniel Hawthorne.
 Bondsman, The. By Hall Caine.
 Book of Golden Deeds. By Charlotte M. Yonge.
 Boone, Daniel, Life of. By Cecil B. Hartley.
 Bride of Lammermoor. By Sir Walter Scott.
 Browning's Poems. (Elizabeth.)
 Browning's Poems. (Robert.)
 Bryant's Poems. W. C. Bryant.
 Burgomasters' Wife. George Ebers.
 Burns' Poems. By Robert Burns.
 By Order of the King. By Hugo.
 Byron's Poems. By Lord Byron.
 Caesar, Julius, Life of. By James Anthony Froude.
 Carson, Kit, Life of. By Charles Burdett.
 Cary's Poems. (Alice and Phoebe.)
 Cast Up by the Sea. Sir S. Baker.
 Charles Auchester. By E. Berger.
 Character. By Samuel Smiles.
 Charlemagne (Charles the Great). Life of. By Thomas Hodgkin.
 Charles O'Malley. By Charles Lever.
 Chesterfield's Letters. By Lord Chesterfield.
 Chevalier de Maison Rouge. By Alexander Dumas.
 Children of the Abbey. By Regina Maria Roche.
 Chicot the Jester. By Alex. Dumas.
 Child's History of England. By Charles Dickens.
 Christmas Stories. Charles Dickens.
 Cloister and the Hearth. By Charles Reade.
 Coleridge's Poems. By S. T. Coleridge.
 Columbus, Christopher, Life of. By Washington Irving.
 Companions of Jehu, The. Dumas.
 Complete Angler. Walton & Cotton.
 Conduct of Life. R. W. Emerson.
 Confessions of an Opium Eater. By Thomas de Quincey.
 Conquest of Granada. By Washington Irving.
 Conquest of Mexico, Vol. I. By Wm. H. Prescott.
 Conquest of Mexico. Vol. II. By Wm. H. Prescott.
 Conquest of Peru. Vol. I. By Wm. H. Prescott.
 Conquest of Peru. Vol. II. By Wm. H. Prescott.
 Conspiracy of Pontiac. By Francis Parkman, Jr.
 Conspirators, The. Dumas.
 Consuelo. By George Sand.
 Cook's Voyages. Captain James Cook.
 Corinne. By Madame de Stael.
 Count of Monte Cristo. Vol. I. By Alex. Dumas.

BURT'S HOME LIBRARY. Cloth. Gilt Tops. Price, $1.25

- Count of Monte Cristo. Vol. II. By Alex. Dumas.
- Countess de Charney. Alex. Dumas.
- Countess of Rudolstadt. Geo. Sand.
- Country Doctor. By H. de Balzac.
- Courtship of Miles Standish. By H. W. Longfellow.
- Cranford. By Mrs. Gaskell.
- Crockett, David. An autobiography.
- Cromwell, Oliver, Life of. By Edwin Paxton Hood.
- Crusades, The. By George W. Cox.
- Daniel Deronda. By George Eliot.
- Data of Ethics. By Herbert Spencer.
- Daughter of an Empress. By Louisa Muhlbach.
- David Copperfield. Charles Dickens.
- Days of Bruce. By Grace Aguilar.
- Deemster, The. By Hall Caine.
- Deerslayer, The. By J. F. Cooper.
- Descent of Man. By Charles Darwin.
- Discourses of Epictetus.
- Divine Comedy, The. (Dante.) Translated by Rev. H. F. Carey.
- Dombey & Son. Charles Dickens.
- Donal Grant. George Macdonald.
- Donovan. By Edna Lyall.
- Dove in the Eagle's Nest. By Charlotte M. Yonge.
- Dream Life. By Ik Marvei.
- Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. By R. L. Stevenson.
- Duty. By Samuel Smiles.
- East Lynne. By Mrs. Henry Wood.
- Education. By Herbert Spencer.
- Egoist. By George Meredith.
- Egyptian Princess. George Ebers.
- Eight Hundred Leagues on the Amazon. By Jules Verne.
- Eliot's Poems. By George Eliot.
- Elizabeth and Her German Garden.
- Elizabeth (Queen of England), Life of. Edward Spencer Beesly.
- Elsie Venner. By O. W. Holmes.
- Emerson's Essays. (Complete.)
- Emerson's Poems. R. W. Emerson.
- Essays in Criticism. Matthew Arnold.
- Essays of Elia. By Charles Lamb.
- Evangeline. By H. W. Longfellow.
- Fair Maid of Perth. Sir Walter Scott.
- Fairly Land of Science. By Arabella B. Buckley.
- Faust. (Goethe.)
- Felix Holt. By George Eliot.
- Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World. By E. S. Creasy.
- File No. 113. By Emile Gaboriau.
- First Principles. Herbert Spencer.
- First Violin. By Jessie Fothergill.
- For Lilies. By Rosa N. Carey.
- Forty-Five Guardsmen. Dumas.
- Foul Play. By Charles Reade.
- Fragments of Science. John Tyndall.
- Franklin, Benjamin, Life of. An autobiography.
- Frederick the Great and His Court. By Louisa Muhlbach.
- Frederick, the Great, Life of. By Francis Kugler.
- French Revolution. Thomas Carlyle.
- From the Earth to the Moon. By Jules Verne.
- Garibaldi, General, Life of. By Theodore Dwight.
- Gil Bias. A. R. Le Sage.
- Gold Bug, The. Edgar A. Poe.
- Gold Elsie. By E. Marlitt.
- Golden Treasury. By T. Palgrave.
- Goldsmith's Poems.
- Grandfather's Chair. By Nathaniel Hawthorne.
- Grant, Ulysses S., Life of. By J. T. Headley.
- Gray's Poems. Thomas Gray.
- Great Expectations. Charles Dickens.
- Greek Heroes. Charles Kingsley.
- Green Mountain Boys, The. By D. P. Thompson.
- Grimm's Household Tales.
- Grimm's Popular Tales.
- Gulliver's Travels. By Dean Swift.
- Guy Mannering. Sir Walter Scott.
- Hale, Nathan, the Martyr Spy. By Charlotte M. Holloway.
- Handy Andy. By Samuel Lover.
- Hannibal, the Carthaginian, Life of. By Thomas Arnold.
- Hardy Norseman. By Edna Lyall.
- Harold. By Bulwer-Lytton.
- Harry Lorrequer. Charles Lever.
- Heart of Midlothian. By Sir Walter Scott.
- Heir of Redclyffe. By Charlotte M. Yonge.
- Heman's Poems. By Felicia Hemans.

BURT'S HOME LIBRARY. Cloth. Gilt Tops. Price, $1.25

- Henry Esmond. W. M. Thackeray.
 Henry, Patrick, Life of. By William Wirt.
 Hereward. By Charles Kingsley.
 Heroes and Hero-Worship. By Thos. Carlyle.
 Hiawatha. By H. W. Longfellow.
 Hidden Hand. By Mrs. Southworth.
 History of Crime. Victor Hugo.
 History of Civilization in Europe. By M. Guizot.
 History of Our Own Times. Vol. I. By Justin McCarthy.
 History of Our Own Times. Vol. II. By Justin McCarthy.
 Holmes' Poems. By O. W. Holmes.
 Holy Roman Empire. James Bryce.
 Homo Sum. By George Ebers.
 Hood's Poems. By Thomas Hood.
 House of the Seven Gables. By Nathaniel Hawthorne.
 Hunchback of Notre Dame. By Victor Hugo.
 Hypatia. By Charles Kingsley.
 Iceland Fisherman. By Pierre Loti.
 Idle Thoughts of an Idle Fellow. By Jerome K. Jerome.
 Iliad, The. Pope's Translation.
 Inez. By Augusta J. Evans.
 Ingelow's Poems. Jean Ingelow.
 Intellectual Life. P. G. Hamerton.
 In the Golden Days. Edna Lyall.
 Ishmael. By Mrs. Southworth.
 It Is Never Too Late to Mend. By Charles Reade.
 Ivanhoe. By Sir Walter Scott.
 Jane Eyre. By Charlotte Bronte.
 Jefferson, Thomas, Life of. By Samuel L. Schmucker.
 Joan of Arc, Life of. By Jules Michelet.
 John Halifax. By Miss Mulock.
 Jones, John Paul, Life of. James Otis.
 Joseph Balsamo. By Alex. Dumas.
 Josephine, Empress of France, Life of. By Fred A. Ober.
 Keats' Poems. By John Keats.
 Kenilworth. By Sir Walter Scott.
 Kidnapped. By R. L. Stevenson.
 King Arthur and His Noble Knights. By Mary Macleod.
 Knickerbocker's History of New York. By Washington Irving.
 Knight Errant. By Edna Lyall.
 Koran, The. Sales Translation.
 Lady of the Lake. By Sir W. Scott.
 Lafayette, Marquis de, Life of. By P. C. Headley.
 Lalla Rookh. By Thomas Moore.
 Lamplighter. Marie S. Cummins.
 Last Days of Pompeii. By Bulwer-Lytton.
 Last of the Barona. Bulwer-Lytton.
 Last of the Mohicans. By James Fenimore Cooper.
 Lee, Gen. Robert E., Life of. By G. Mercer Adam.
 Lena Rivers. By Mary J. Holmes.
 Les Miserables. Vol. I. By Victor Hugo.
 Les Miserables. Vol. II. By Victor Hugo.
 Life of Christ. By F. W. Farrar.
 Life of Jesus. By Earnest Renan.
 Light of Asia. Sir Edwin Arnold.
 Light That Failed, The. By Rudyard Kipling.
 Lincoln, Abraham, Life of. By Henry Ketcham.
 Lincoln's Speeches. By G. Mercer Adam.
 Literature and Dogma. By Matthew Arnold.
 Little Dorrit. By Charles Dickens.
 Little Minister, The. By James M. Barrie.
 Livingstone, David. Life of. By Thomas Hughes.
 Longfellow's Poems. H. W. Longfellow.
 Lorna Doone. R. D. Blackmore.
 Louise de la Valliere. Alex. Dumas.
 Lowell's Poems. J. Russell Lowell.
 Lucile. By Owen Meredith.
 Macaria. Augusta J. Evans.
 Macauley's Literary Essays. By T. B. Macauley.
 Magic Skin. Honore de Balzac.
 Mahomet, Life of. Washington Irving.
 Makers of Florence. Mrs. Oliphant.
 Makers of Venice. Mrs. Oliphant.

BURT'S HOME LIBRARY. Cloth. Gilt Tops. Price, $1.25

- Man in the Iron Mask. By Alexandre Dumas.
- Marble Faun. N. Hawthorne.
- Marguerite de la Valois. By Alexandre Dumas.
- Marius, The Epicurean. By Walter Pater.
- Marmion. By Sir Walter Scott.
- Marquis of Lossie. Geo. MacDonald.
- Martin Chuzzlewit. Charles Dickens.
- Mary, Queen of Scots, Life of. By P. C. Headley.
- Master of Ballantrae, The. By R. L. Stevenson.
- Masterman Ready. Capt. Marryatt.
- Meadow Brook. Mary J. Holmes.
- Meditations of Marcus Aurelius.
- Memoirs of a Physician. By Alexandre Dumas.
- Micah Clarke. A. Conan Doyle.
- Michael Strogoff. Jules Verne.
- Middlemarch. By George Eliot.
- Midshipman Easy. Capt. Marryatt.
- Mill on the Floss. By George Eliot.
- Milton's Poems. John Milton.
- Minister's Wooing, The. By Harriet Beecher Stowe.
- Monastery. Sir Walter Scott.
- Montaigne's Essays. Vol. I. By Michel de Montaigne.
- Montaigne's Essays. Vol. II. By Michel de Montaigne.
- Moonstone, The. By Wilkie Collins.
- Moore's Poems. Thomas Moore.
- Mosses from an Old Manse. By Nathaniel Hawthorne.
- Murders in the Rue Morgue. By Edgar Allan Poe.
- Mysterious Island. Jules Verne.
- Napoleon and His Marshals. By J. T. Headley.
- Napoleon Bonaparte, Life of. By P. C. Headley.
- Natural Law in the Spiritual World. By Henry Drummond.
- Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym. By Edgar Allan Poe.
- Nature, Addresses and Lectures. By R. W. Emerson.
- Nelson, Admiral Horatio, Life of. By Robert Southey.
- Newcomes. The. W. M. Thackeray.
- Nicholas Nickleby. Chas. Dickens.
- Ninety-Three. By Victor Hugo.
- Not Like Other Girls. By Rosa N. Carey.
- Odyssey, The. Pope's Translation.
- Old Curiosity Shop. Chas. Dickens.
- Old Mam'selle's Secret. By E. Marlitt.
- Old Mortality. Sir Walter Scott.
- Old Myddleton's Money. By Mary Cecil Hay.
- Oliver Twist. By Chas. Dickens.
- Only the Governess. By Rosa N. Carey.
- On the Heights. B. Auerbach.
- Oregon Trail. Francis Parkman.
- Origin of Species. Charles Darwin.
- Other Worlds Than Ours. By Richard Proctor.
- Our Mutual Friend. Chas. Dickens.
- Page of the Duke of Savoy. Dumas.
- Past and Present. Thos. Carlyle.
- Pathfinder, The. By James F. Cooper.
- Paul and Virginia. St. Pierre.
- Pendennis. Wm. M. Thackeray.
- Penn, William, Life of. By W. Hepworth Dixon.
- Pere Goriot. Honore de Balzac.
- Peter, the Great, Life of. By John Barrow.
- Phantom Rickshaw, The. By Rudyard Kipling.
- Philip II. of Spain, Life of. By Martin A. S. Hume.
- Pickwick Papers. Charles Dickens.
- Pilgrim's Progress. John Bunyan.
- Pillar of Fire. J. H. Ingraham.
- Pilot, The. James F. Cooper.
- Pioneers, The. James F. Cooper.
- Pirate, The. Sir Walter Scott.
- Plain Tales from the Hills. By Rudyard Kipling.
- Plato's Dialogues.
- Pleasures of Life. Sir J. Lubbock.
- Poe's Poems. By Edgar A. Poe.
- Pope's Poems. Alexander Pope.
- Prairie, The. James F. Cooper.

BURT'S HOME LIBRARY. Cloth. Gilt Tops. Price, $1.25

- Pride and Prejudice. Jane Austen.
 Prince of the House of David. By Rev. J. H. Ingraham.
 Princess of Thule. Wm. Black.
 Procter's Poems. Adelaide Procter.
 Prue and I. George Wm. Curtis.
 Putnam, General Israel, Life of. By George Canning Hill.
 Put Yourself in His Place. Charles Reade.
 Queenie's Whim. Rosa N. Carey.
 Queen's Necklace. Alex. Dumas.
 Quentin Durward. Walter Scott.
 Rasselas. Samuel Johnson.
 Redgauntlet. Sir Walter Scott.
 Red Rover. By James F. Cooper.
 Regent's Daughter. By Alex. Dumas.
 Representative Men. R. W. Emerson.
 Republic of Plato.
 Reveries of a Bachelor. By Ik Marvel.
 Richelieu, Cardinal, Life of. By Richard Lodge.
 Rienzi. By Bulwer-Lytton.
 Robinson Crusoe. Daniel Defoe.
 Rob Roy. Sir Walter Scott.
 Romance of Two Worlds. By Marie Corelli.
 Romola. By George Eliot.
 Rory O'Moore. Samuel Lover.
 Rossetti's Poems.
 Royal Edinburgh. Mrs. Oliphant.
 Rutledge. Miriam Coles Harris.
 Samantha at Saratoga. By Josiah Allen's Wife.
 Sartor Resartus. Thomas Carlyle.
 Scarlet Letter. Nathaniel Hawthorne.
 Schonberg-Cotta Family. By Mrs. Andrew Charles.
 Schopenhauer's Essays.
 Scottish Chiefs. By Jane Porter.
 Scott's Poems. Walter Scott.
 Second Wife. The. E. Marlitt.
 Seekers After God. F. W. Farrar.
 Self-Help. By Samuel Smiles.
 Self-Raised. By Mrs. Southworth.
 Seneca's Morals.
 Sense and Sensibility. By Jane Austen.
 Sentimental Journey. Laurence Sterne.
 Sesame and Lillies. John Ruskin.
 Shakespeare's Heroines. Anna Jameson.
 Shelley's Poems.
 Shirley. By Charlotte Bronte.
 Sing of the Four. By A. Conan Doyle.
 Silas Marner. By George Eliot.
 Silence of Dean Maitland. By Maxwell Grey.
 Sir Gibbie. George Macdonald.
 Sketch Book. By Washington Irving.
 Socrates, Trial and Death of.
 Soldiers Three. Rudyard Kipling.
 Spy, The. By James F. Cooper.
 Stanley, Henry M., Life of. By A. Montefiore.
 Story of an African Farm. By Olive Schreiner.
 Story of John G. Paton. By Rev. Jas. Paton.
 St. Elmo. By Augusta J. Evans.
 St. Ronan's Well. Walter Scott.
 Study in Scarlet. A. Conan Doyle.
 Surgeon's Daughter, The. By Sir Walter Scott.
 Swineburne's Poems.
 Swiss Family Robinson. By Jean Rudolph Wyss.
 Taking the Bastile, Alex. Dumas.
 Tale of Two Cities, Chas. Dickens.
 Tales from Shakespeare. By Charles and Mary Lamb.
 Tales of a Traveller. By Washington Irving.
 Talisman. Sir Walter Scott.
 Tanglewood Tales. N. Hawthorne.
 Tempest and Sunshine. By Mary J. Holmes.
 Ten Nights in a Bar Room. By T. S. Arthur.
 Tennyson's Poems.
 Ten Years Later, Alex. Dumas.
 Terrible Temptation. Charles Reade.
 Thaddeus of Warsaw. By Jane Porter.
 Thelma. By Marie Corelli.
 Thirty Years' War. By Frederick Schiller.
 Thousand Miles Up the Nile. By Amelia B. Edwards.

BURT'S HOME LIBRARY. Cloth. Gilt Tops. Price, $1.25

- |  |  |
|--|--|
| Three Guardsmen. Alex Dumas.                           | Wandering Jew, The. Vol. I. By Eugene Sue.             |
| Three Men in a Boat. Jerome.                           | Wandering Jew, The. Vol. II. By Eugene Sue.            |
| Thrift. By Samuel Smiles.                              | Washington and His Generals. By J. T. Headley.         |
| Throne of David. J. H. Ingraham.                       | Washington, George. Life of. By Jared Sparks.          |
| Toilers of the Sea. Victor Hugo.                       | Water Babies. Charles Kingsley.                        |
| Tom Brown at Oxford. By Thomas Hughes.                 | Water Witch. James F. Cooper.                          |
| Tom Brown's School Days. By Thos. Hughes.              | Waverly. By Sir Walter Scott.                          |
| Tour of the World in Eighty Days. By Jules Verne.      | Webster, Daniel, Life of. By Samuel M. Schmucker.      |
| Treasure Island. R. L. Stevenson.                      | Webster's Speeches. (Selected).                        |
| Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea. By Jules Verne. | Westward Ho. Charles Kingsley.                         |
| Twenty Years After. Alex. Dumas.                       | We Two. By Edna Lyall.                                 |
| Twice Told Tales. N. Hawthorne.                        | White Company. A Conan Doyle.                          |
| Two Admirals. By J. F. Cooper.                         | Whites and the Blues. Dumas.                           |
| Two years Before the Mast. By R. H. Dana, Jr.          | Whittier's Poems. J. G. Whittier.                      |
| Uarda. By George Ebers.                                | Wide, Wide World. By Susan Warner.                     |
| Uncle Max. Rosa N. Carey.                              | William, the Conqueror, Life of. By Edward A. Freeman. |
| Uncle Tom's Cabin. By Harriet Beecher Stowe.           | William, the Silent, Life of. By Frederick Harrison.   |
| Under Two Flags. By "Ouida."                           | Window in Thrums. J. M. Barrie.                        |
| Utopia. By Sir Thomas Moore.                           | Wing and Wing. J. F. Cooper.                           |
| Vanity Fair. Wm. M. Thackeray.                         | Wolsey, Cardinal, Life of. By Mandell Creighton.       |
| Vendetta. By Marie Corelli.                            | Woman in White. Wilkie Collins.                        |
| Vicar of Wakefield. By Oliver Goldsmith.               | Won by Waiting. Edna Lyall.                            |
| Vicomte de Bragelonne. By Alexandre Dumas.             | Wonder Book. N. Hawthorne.                             |
| Views A-Foot. Bayard Taylor.                           | Woodstock. By Sir Walter Scott.                        |
| Villette. By Charlotte Bronte.                         | Wordsworth's Poems.                                    |
| Virginians. Wm. M. Thackeray.                          | Wormwood. By Marie Corelli.                            |
| Walden. By Henry D. Thoreau.                           |  |

Deacidified using the Bookkeeper process.
Neutralizing agent: Magnesium Oxide Treatment Date: April 2009

Preservation Technologies
A WORLD LEADER IN COLLECTIONS PRESERVATION

111 Thomson Park Drive
Cranberry Township, PA 16066
(724) 779-2111

WERT
BOOKBINDING
Grantsville, Pa
July - Aug 1985
We're Quality Bound

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 014 526 965 9

